THE SENATE

Tuesday, April 26, 1977

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Willie Adams, Esquire

Hon. Horace Andrew (Bud) Olson, P.C.

Royce Frith, Esquire

Peter Bosa, Esquire

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons, which were read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk, and were seated:

Hon. Willie Adams, of Rankin Inlet, in the Northwest Territories, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. Paul Henry Lucier.

Hon. Horace Andrew (Bud) Olson, P.C., of Iddesleigh, Alberta, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. Earl A. Hastings.

Hon. Royce Frith, of Perth, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. John J. Connolly.

Hon. Peter Bosa, of Toronto, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. Keith Davey.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-2, to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PENSION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-11, to amend the Pension Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that this is the second bill for which the government has asked leave to proceed at the next sitting, would the Leader of the Government indicate to us why he feels it is necessary that we waive the usual two days' notice?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the fact is that Bill C-2, the first of the two proposed measures for which the government seeks leave to proceed with second reading at the next sitting, was of course the second measure introduced in Parliament at this session. This bill has been over from the other place since April 1, and it is felt that it would be in the public interest, in view of the importance of the measure, to proceed with the debate on second reading tomorrow.

With respect to Bill C-11, to amend the Pension Act, because of the important content of this particular act the government simply expresses the hope that in this case the opposition will support second reading at the next sitting. If the opposition chooses to take another course of action, the government certainly will not resist that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SOLAR ENERGY APPLICATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-309, respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Forsey moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE JOSEPH A. SULLIVAN THE HONOURABLE JAMES J. DUGGAN THE HONOURABLE J. CAMPBELL HAIG

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say how pleased all of us are to welcome back to our midst three distinguished senators, Senator Sullivan, Senator Duggan and Senator Haig, who have suffered from health setbacks in recent weeks and now appear to be restored to good health. All three of these distinguished senators make important contributions to our deliberations and we are most glad to have them back.

May I say that we extend our good wishes to each of the senators who were officially declared senators this evening. We wish them long and productive careers in this chamber. We know that they will make a constructive contribution to the work of Parliament.

Senator Grosart: Will the leader permit me to comment on the statement he has just made? Honourable senators will understand if I say on behalf of all the official opposition, that while we welcome back the three senators who have been mentioned, we particularly welcome Senator Sullivan and Senator Haig. They will make a particularly welcome continuing contribution to our work on this side of the house, especially in view of the fact that the Prime Minister has once again found it necessary to send much needed reinforcements to the government side.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: We welcome the new senators, of course, and realize how necessary the additional strength is to the government side.

I might also say that Senator Sullivan has not only recovered in time to provide us with his usual assistance, but also in time to receive another of the many great distinctions he has received in his professional career. On May 10, I am informed, he will be elected a Fellow Emeritus of the American Otological Society at its Eightieth Annual Meeting to be held in Boston.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: He is already a Senior Fellow of that society, and this will add another to the many international honours he has received.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on the subject of Senate appointments—and I have expressed my views on this subject many times in the past—the ability to serve in this chamber is not restricted to any one political party. I can only commend to members of the opposition the words of Lord Tennyson in his work Sir Galahad:

My strength is as the strength of ten,

Because my heart is pure.

May I follow that with the well-known philosophical observation that all good things come to those who wait. We on this side certainly believe that the opposition requires strengthening, not because of any lack of ability on the part of its present members but because of the problems with which it is confronted, such as representation on the many committees of the Senate.

Senator Asselin: We have quality.

Senator Perrault: I can only urge the opposition to follow the procedures which have been established by the Prime Minister for the appointment of opposition senators and suggest the names of other members of that party, or indeed other opposition parties, who may be able to serve with distinction.

Senator Asselin: Jack Horner.

Senator Smith (Colchester): We will be able to fix that fairly soon.

CABINET SOLIDARITY

QUESTION

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he was following the principle of cabinet solidarity when he emphasized earlier that he would like to see more Conservative appointments to the Senate.

● (2020)

Senator Perrault: Well, supporters of the government have always been firm advocates of parliamentary democracy, and parliamentary democracies work most effectively when there is a vigorous and able opposition. There is nothing inconsistent in my statement and the long prevailing principles of liberalism.

CONFEDERATION

FINANCIAL CONTRIBUTION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the government leader a question. In view of the comments by the federal government on the cost-benefit ratio of Quebec's participation in Confederation, and the comments by the Province of Quebec and the Province of Ontario on that subject, I wonder whether the government leader would make available to this chamber the same figures with respect to my province of British Columbia.

What is the net financial contribution of British Columbia to Confederation? In asking that question I am not by any means anxious to leave the implication that British Columbia in any way resents making a net contribution to Canada. It is very much worth it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall certainly direct a request to the Honourable Minister of Finance for that information. At the same time I am sure no member of this chamber believes that the benefits of Confederation can be measured simply in terms of a computer printout.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

IMMIGRATION

PERSONS LIVING IN CANADA UNDER DEPORTATION ORDERS OR CONTRARY TO COURT RULINGS—QUESTION

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, on March 24 I asked the Acting Leader of the Government about a report made by a public servant by the name of Boris Domazet. The report had been distributed at that time to a certain number of members of Parliament and had received considerable attention in the press. I requested of the acting leader to make a copy of that report available to the house, and I was told that this would be done. I should now like to ask the Leader of the Government when that report will be produced.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that report will be produced as quickly as possible; I would hope to have it for tomorrow's sitting.

SPORTS

PERFORMANCE OF TEAM CANADA AT WORLD HOCKEY
TOURNAMENT IN VIENNA—QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government, in view of the latest catastrophe that has overtaken Canada's representation in international hockey, whether any consideration is being given to changing the method by which Team Canada is constituted, recruited, coached, directed and managed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I take great pride in the fact that tonight Canada played Czechoslovakia to a 3-all tie and, I understand, but for "a twist of fate" we would have emerged victorious. Having said that, a number of questions have been asked about the method of developing our teams for international competition. In view of Senator Molson's extensive background in this important Canadian sport, I would hope that he would be able to share his expertise in this subject with the government.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government whether the taxpayers of Canada have contributed anything financially to this debacle between Canada and the Soviet Union in the field of hockey?

Senator Perrault: I am sorry, I do not know the financial details of our participation in the competition in Europe, but it is my understanding that taxpayers' money has not been diverted for that purpose. I think, however, as our distinguished Senator Sullivan, whom we are very glad to welcome back tonight, is aware, in all sports there are wins and there are losses and some hurt more than others, the honourable senator having been one of Canada's outstanding hockey players during his active athletic career.

NATIONAL UNITY

PROPOSED COMMITTEE ON REGIONAL ASPIRATIONS—
QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, at the beginning of this session the Leader of the Government proposed that the Senate consider setting up a Senate committee to try to sell federalism. He said he would submit a sort of formula for such a committee of the Senate. I should like to know if the leader has abandoned his idea. What is happening in respect of this matter?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, at no time have I ever said that the purpose of such a committee—if, in fact, the Senate supports the formation of such a committee—would be to "sell federalism." Rather, its purpose might be to study problems such as regional aspirations and regional disparities, and the views of Canadians in various regions about the future of this country, the future of the Constitution and other matters of that kind. The idea of a travelling Senate committee is still under active study by the government, and I would hope an announcement can be made in the next two or three weeks.

I want to assure honourable senators that the government is not being dilatory about this matter. It requires great care and thought to draw up appropriate terms of reference for such a committee.

In this regard, I acknowledge the constructive contribution of the Leader of the Opposition, who has provided me with a memorandum on the possible terms of reference for such a committee. The official opposition in this chamber has been most helpful, and I want to thank Senator Flynn and his colleagues for their interest and support. When the Leader of the Opposition is present in Ottawa again—I understand he may be here tomorrow—I hope that we can have further discussions.

I think there is a desire on the part of all members of the Senate to make positive contributions to the cause of national unity and a better understanding of Canada's problems at this particularly sensitive and critical time in the history of our country. The idea of a committee study has not been abandoned, but the shape and form of that possible Senate committee has not yet been finally established.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY BAN ON USE OF

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 31, the date on the motion of Senator Buckwold that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into and report upon the proposed ban on the use of saccharin.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, before proceeding to speak to this motion moved by my colleague Senator Buckwold on March 31, I wonder if I might be allowed to say a few words of welcome to the four new senators. Two of them are well known to me, as I think they are to most of us. I am sure I will get to know the other two in the future. As the first speaker on the Orders of the Day, I want to take this opportunity to welcome the new senators, and to say that we are happy they have been appointed and that we look forward to the contributions they will make to the welfare of their provinces and this country.

When I adjourned this debate on March 31, I did so for two reasons. First, as the seconder of Senator Buckwold's motion, I wanted the opportunity to say a word or two about it. I recognized that, even if authorized, the committee could not commence its study before the Easter recess, and, therefore, I thought it wise to adjourn the debate so that we could all give the motion further consideration, and also hear the arguments pro and con from both Canada and the United States. That has, of course, happened. I do not know whether I am more convinced in my support of the motion than I was on March 31, but there has been considerable dialogue in Canada and the United States on this matter over the past few weeks.

When this matter was brought to our attention by Senator Buckwold I felt that perhaps the department had made a mistake. I did not believe, and I do not believe now, that the evidence which has been presented to us on the results of the use of saccharin is at all clear. As Senator Buckwold pointed out, in the tests carried out with rats 5 per cent of the total diet of the rats consisted of saccharin, and that constitutes an overdose of anything. Humans would have to drink some 800 cans of soft drinks per day in order to have the same intake of saccharin as those poor rats. If a person drank that quantity I do not think he or she would live long enough to die of cancer. It seems to me that there are many substances in this world, many of them included in our everyday diet, that if taken in such massive doses would cause death and, I suggest to you, probably sooner than later.

● (2030)

As far as I am concerned, of all the evidence that I have heard or read, both prior to and since March 31, there is none that confuses me more than the massive amounts of saccharin that were administered to the rats in these experiments. I can only repeat that in my opinion such massive doses of anything would create conditions, in either rats or human beings, that none of us would welcome.

Senator Sullivan: You are 100 per cent right.

Senator McDonald: Thank you very much. I am glad I have one supporter—an eminent supporter at that.

Senator Smith (Colchester): You have two.

Senator McDonald: However, Senator Buckwold's motion is that our Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into this subject matter. I do not know whether the findings of the Department of National Health and Welfare are correct but, if this subject matter is referred to a Senate committee, I hope that the committee would call not only departmental witnesses but also expert witnesses from outside the Government of Canada. I am sure that witnesses from other countries, especially from our good neighbour to the south, would be ready and willing to testify.

I happen to be one of those persons who live by a needle, and I have done so for 25 years. I don't like sugar and never did, and I don't like saccharin and never did, so it matters not to me whether artificial sweeteners or sugar are outlawed. I could not care less. However, I know of many people, not only those who suffer from diabetes but from other diseases, who will be affected if this legislation is passed, but those who will be affected most will be those who suffer from obesity. There are hundreds of thousands of these people throughout Canada and the world. On a percentage basis, perhaps more can be found on the North American continent than in any other part of the world. If an artificial sweetener is not available to those who suffer from obesity, I suggest that the medical hardships they will suffer could be far greater than any suffering that may be caused by the use of saccharin. I do not know but perhaps the committee can find the answer to that question which I, together with many Canadians and Americans, have in our minds.

The only comment I wish to make in conclusion is that I believe the Senate would be doing a service to Canada and, yes, to North America by giving further study to this problem. We can do that, and in a very short space of time, by hearing experts from both within and outside the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Senator Sullivan: Honourable senators, I had no intention whatsoever of participating in this debate, but frankly, from some of the pronouncements I have heard, I think the subject has been blown up out of all proportion. Very recent studies at Johns Hopkins University have disproved what we have been told. Why is it that the use of saccharin over 40 or 50 years has not produced carcinogenic changes in the bladder?

Although I did not want to, I am going to adjourn the debate, and my conclusion will not be dissimilar to Senator McDonald's.

On motion of Senator Sullivan, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before putting the question, I should like to invite all honourable senators to join the new senators and their guests in my chamber.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, April 27, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Canadian National Railways, together with the Auditor's Report on the Accounts and Financial Statements thereof, for the year ended December 31, 1976, pursuant to section 40 of the Canadian National Railways Act, Chapter C-10, R.S.C., 1970.

ROYAL EMBLEMS

REMOVAL OF CROWN FROM GOVERNOR GENERAL'S PRIVATE RAILWAY CARS—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government to ascertain, if he can do so within a reasonable time, whether there is any truth in the story, of which I was credibly informed this morning, that the Crown on the side of the Governor General's private railway cars has been painted out or painted over.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have heard no such report, but I shall certainly direct inquiries to the appropriate source.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-2, to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops.

He said: Honourable senators, before proceeding with a description of the bill before us I should like to take this opportunity to welcome to our chamber the four new senators who were introduced last night. I have had the personal pleasure of knowing three of them well in past years, and I look forward to working with them in the years ahead. I have not yet had the pleasure of meeting Senator Adams, although he is a neighbour of mine, coming, as he does, from Rankin Inlet. I have the impression that the province closest to that particular location is Manitoba, and I welcome particularly Senator Adams to this chamber. I hope that we shall be able to work together on the many problems in northern Manitoba that are similar to the problems faced by the Northwest Territories.

Bill C-2 is intended to assist producers of storable crops in all parts of Canada to market their crops in an orderly manner by establishing an advance payments program. In our mechanical and technical society, producers are forced every year to meet heavy production costs which involve a substantial and ever-increasing cash outlay for them. They are unable, in a number of cases, to obtain cash immediately for their products.

A further problem is created by the fact that in some years, in order to get cash, they are forced to put their goods on the market right away. The result is that there is a heavy influx at one particular time. This has a tendency to distort the market and depress market prices at that particular period, and it does not allow producers to get the maximum return to which they are entitled. It is the intention of this act to provide for a more orderly pattern, and this in turn will have some effect on potential transportation bottlenecks at peak periods.

Under the legislation, the government can guarantee to a bank the repayment with interest of advances made under this program provided the producers and their organizations safeguard the government guarantee as set out in the act.

The concept of advance payments is not a new one. It has existed for some time under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, which operates under the aegis of the Canadian Wheat Board for producers of wheat, oats and barley, and which has been an extremely successful program.

Our colleague, Senator McNamara, was at one time the Chief Commissioner of the Wheat Board, and he can attest to the usefulness of that program, and its very low cost to the national treasury. That act has improved the cash flow to grain farmers, particularly after the critical harvest period when there were low Wheat Board quotas during years of heavy production and difficult sales.

Western grain farmers face delivery restrictions after the harvest, but, under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments program, they can receive interest-free advances on undelivered grain. Wheat, oats and barley are sold to the Canadian Wheat Board in its designated area, and so far are the only three crops in respect of which this particular privilege can be obtained. It is now the intention of the government to extend this provision to other crops specified under the act, and to permit many other agricultural producers in the country to benefit from this kind of program.

Bill C-2 covers such items as white beans, tree fruits, cole and root crops, tobacco, soybeans, Ontario wheat, honey, maple syrup and many other basic agricultural products, and would improve the cash flow of producers, particularly in the post-harvest period.

It will provide the legislative authority for the federal government to guarantee the repayment of advance payments on storable crops. In addition, it will guarantee the interest on such advance payments when they are made in accordance with the provisions of the act.

The program will operate in this way: Where a producer organization intends to make an advance payment to a producer out of money borrowed for that purpose from a bank, the government will guarantee the repayment of the advance, including interest which is to be charged and over which the government will have a control. In the case of producer defaults—and using the Prairie Grain Advance Payments program as an example, such defaults represent a very small percentage of the producers receiving advance payments—maximum liability, including interest, of the national treasury at any time will not exceed $200 million. Producer organizations, whether they are cooperatives or individuals, can take advantage of this legislation by organizing themselves into legally incorporated bodies and demonstrating that they produce a significant portion of a crop in the area that they represent.

In order to receive a guarantee from the government, Agriculture Canada must be satisfied that the producer organization applying for a cash advance represents a significant portion of the crop for the area in question. On this point the department will take appropriate measures to guarantee that such organizations do in fact represent a significant portion of the crop in that area. The organization must indicate that making such advance payments will facilitate orderly marketing of that crop, and must satisfy the government that it will repay the money borrowed to make advance payments. The organization must also be able to show that it is capable of administering the payment and collection of advances, and of discharging its obligations to the bank and the government. Advance payments will be issued by eligible farm organizations for a period not exceeding a 12-month crop year, but due to the storable life of particular crops the period of the advance may be less than 12 months.

Producers are required to apply for an advance, and must provide the required information regarding the quantity and condition of the crop in store. They must also provide a written undertaking to the organization to repay the advance by selling that portion of the crop to which the advance applies to a named buyer or buyers, and authorizing such buyer or buyers to deduct from the amount payable to the producer the rate per unit prescribed for that crop in the crop year in which the advance was made.

The maximum amount to be advanced under this measure in any crop year to one eligible producer is $15,000, which is the same as is provided for in Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. Where a producer is a family farm corporation, a partnership, or a cooperative having two or more shareholders, partners or members who are 18 years of age or over, and are principally engaged in the farming operation, and who undertake to be jointly liable for the amount of the advance, then the maximum of the advance eligible for the guarantee is $30,000 where there are two such shareholders, partners, or members and $45,000—which is the ultimate maximum—where there are three or more. In all cases the amount of an advance payment possible under this bill cannot exceed one-half of the unit market price payable for that crop in that crop year. For example, if Ontario wheat is selling at $3.50 a bushel, then the payment can be up to $1.75 a bushel.

This bill covers all possibilities of producer default but, if the experience of the Prairie Grain Advance Payments program is an indication, such defaults really represent only a very small percentage of the producers receiving advance payments. In the event of defaults, the maximum government liability, including interest, at any time will not exceed $200 million.

Producers who make application for such advances must store the portion of the crop on which an advance payment is made either on their own premises, on another farm, or commercially, but they must in all cases do so in their own names.

A producer cannot receive an advance if he is in arrears or default in respect of a previous advance. A producer is deemed to be in default if he has not repaid any part of his advance within 20 days of being advised in writing that he must discharge his undertaking by delivery of the crop in question. Producers may repay an advance in cash, in lieu of delivery of the crop, but are subject to interest charges on the advance from the date the advance was made. The reason for this provision is that the purpose of the advance is to ensure orderly marketing, and to provide interest-free cash to a producer. Hence it is tied to the delivery of the crop.

Administrative costs of the advance payments scheme will be carried largely by the participating producer organizations, as is the case in the Prairie Grain Advance Payments program. However, federal control and administration will be the responsibility of the Grains and Special Crops Division of Agriculture Canada. The department estimates that the proposed Advance Payment for Crops Act will cost from $3 million to $5 million in its first year of operation. It is anticipated that before the regulations are written, formal discussions will be held with interested farm organizations to work out the details of administrative arrangements, and to determine what is a significant portion of a crop and what should be the criteria designating the size of an area.

The logic behind Bill C-2 is not new in Canadian agriculture. The measure is an extension of an advance-payments program that has substantially benefited the producers of wheat, oats and barley in western Canada—the region in which the Canadian Wheat Board operates—and it should ease the cash flow to farmers of other storable crops when they need that advance most.

This legislation would help round out other programs in agriculture to provide stability to the farming community. There are great risks, as we all know, in farming. The weather and markets are things that are not under government control. This kind of program, providing for an advance on a produced and designated crop, with some very clear limits as to delivery and providing for an averaging-out of delivery through the year, will be a further step in providing stability to the farming community.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may ask the honourable senator a question? As I understand it, the government guarantees the loan to the producer organizations. Does the individual producer have to make application through the producer organization, or can he apply directly to a bank?

Senator Molgat: It is my understanding that the producer makes his application to the organization in question and gets the advance from that organization, which then obtains its money either from its own funds, if it has funds, or from a bank, and that the government guarantees the loan from the bank to the organization, not to the producer.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

PENSION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the second reading of Bill C-11, to amend the Pension Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-11 simply amends one section of the Pension Act, namely, section 75, which has to do with the Pension Review Board. Perhaps a little background information will help put the amendments of Bill C-11 in better perspective and, at the same time, enable readers of Hansard to have a better understanding of the procedure for adjudication of veterans' pensions.

The Pension Act, which came into existence following World War I, governs the adjudication of disability pensions for Canadian veterans. It established the Canadian Pension Commission for that purpose.

Following World War II, complaints were voiced by veterans, individually and through their organizations, about the way the adjudicative machinery under the act was operating, and the manner in which the commission was interpreting certain sections of the act, particularly the section designed to ensure that in cases where the evidence was not conclusive the veteran would receive the benefit of the doubt.

The specific complaints about the machinery for adjudicating veterans' claims for pensions had to do mainly with the procedures adopted by the commission. These were as follows: the initial claim was considered by the commission, and if the decision was unfavourable the veteran could request a second, third or fourth hearing, as long as he provided additional evidence.

If the decision remained unfavourable and the veteran was still not satisfied, he could request an appeal board hearing. This appeal board was constituted by the commission from its members, and often included members of the commission who had already adjudicated the veteran's claim at the first, second or third hearing. Thus, the appeal board was often in the position of sitting in judgment on a decision that had already been made by one or more of its own members. This was not a very satisfactory situation, because the decision of the appeal board was both final and binding, and no further recourse was available.

There were also complaints that the Veterans' Bureau, the body constituted under the act to provide legal advice and assistance to veterans in the preparation and presentation of their claims, was actually a part of the Department of Veterans Affairs, and since in cases of appeal the department was required to provide summaries of evidence, both for and against the veteran, it was felt that the Veterans' Bureau was in a conflict of interest position.

As a result of these complaints, in 1965 the government set up a three-man commission under Mr. Justice Mervyn Woods to study the Pension Act in the light of these complaints, to receive representations from veterans and veterans organizations, and to make recommendations to the government. This commission, known as the Woods Commission, made 148 recommendations, and in 1969 the government published a white paper setting forth the recommendations they were prepared to accept. This white paper was studied by the House of Commons Committee on Veterans Affairs, and their report was tabled in the session of 1969-70.

In 1971, the government introduced Bill C-203, which constituted a massive overhaul of the Pension Act. It separated the Veterans' Bureau from the department and set it up as an independent autonomous body. It attempted to clarify the benefit of doubt clause and provided clearer guidelines for its adjudication. It provided new benefits and set forth new procedures and new machinery for the adjudication of veterans' claims. The Canadian Pension Commission still remains, and is still the first body to receive and adjudicate veterans' claims.

Up to this point the procedure remained unchanged, but in cases where a veteran's claim had been rejected by the Canadian Pension Commission, or where the veteran was not satisfied with the decision handed down, Bill C-203 provided further stages of adjudication. Bill C-203 is now the present law, and it provides for the setting up of an Entitlement Board before which the veteran can appear and state his claim in person, with the help of the pensions advocate and other witnesses, if necessary.

It must be noted that this appearance before the Entitlement Board is not automatic. It must be requested by the veteran. It should be noted, too, that the Entitlement Board is constituted by the Canadian Pension Commission in the same way as the old appeal board was constituted. Thus, it is still open to the same objection that members of the Entitlement Board are in the position of sitting in judgment of a decision that has already been made by one or more of its own members. There is this difference, however: the decision of the Entitlement Board is not final and binding, because the present act provides a final court of appeal, a completely independent body, which is the Pension Review Board. The Pension Review Board does not hear witnesses. It goes over the evidence submitted to the Pension Commission and to the Entitlement Board, and it may hear arguments and receive representations from the Veterans' Bureau on behalf of the veteran. Its decisions are final and binding, but if new evidence can be produced which has not already been considered a case may be re-opened, or the Pension Review Board may direct the Pension Commission or the Entitlement Board to hold a further hearing.

It is this Pension Review Board which is the sole concern of Bill C-11, the bill we have before us. The original board was made up of a chairman and four permanent members. The number of permanent members remains the same but Bill C-11 provides for the appointment of two ad hoc members for terms not exceeding one year. It also extends the tenure of the permanent members from five to ten years, and provides for one of them to be appointed deputy chairman to preside over meetings and to exercise the authority of the chairman in his absence. It clarifies the provision relating to the termination of office of board members and provides for the salaries of the ad hoc members and deputy chairman. In addition, it provides for a member of the board to act as chairman or deputy chairman in the event of the absence or incapacity of the chairman or deputy chairman.

The ad hoc members are required because the Pension Commission now has a backlog of some 3,000 claims, and the number of applications to each of the three bodies is increasing rapidly. In the last three years appeals to the Pension Review Board have increased at the rate of 200 per year. The number of appeals has gone from 476 in 1973 to 1,200 in 1976. The increase in 1975 was 39 per cent over 1974, and the increase last year was 57 per cent over 1975. The Pension Review Board, with its present five members, can deal with about 500 cases per year. They already have a backlog of some 400 cases, and to reduce this number and keep abreast of the increase the ad hoc members and other changes are required.

About one-third of the cases dealt with by the Pension Commission are approved, and the reversal of decisions by the Entitlement Board and the Pension Review Board are roughly in the same proportion.

Apart from reviewing pension claims, another very important duty of the Pension Review Board is to interpret the Pension Act. In this connection the Pension Review Board is building up a body of jurisprudence and precedents which should be of the greatest assistance to the Pension Commission and to the Entitlement Board, and should in time reduce the number of appeals.

Canada can be justly proud of its veterans legislation, commonly referred to as the Veterans' Charter. It is by far the best in the whole world though it is still capable of improvement. The adjudication of claims by the Pension Commission needs to be speeded up, because in many cases it takes months—sometimes a year—from the time the veteran files his claim to the time that the commission hands down the initial decision. Then more months elapse while the claim is dealt with by the Entitlement Board and finally by the Pension Review Board.

Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to express my personal gratitude to the members of these three bodies, and to the Veterans' Bureau, for the cooperative and sympathetic manner in which they have dealt with the many cases I have brought to their attention. I do not think a more dedicated and devoted group can be found anywhere in the world. René Jutras, Chairman of the Pension Review Board, is a very old and dear friend of mine. We were deskmates in the other place. We are fortunate in having a person of his talents and capabilities, outlook and sensitivity, as chairman of such an important organization, particularly in its initial and experimental stages. The members of all three bodies deserve our highest commendation.

Bill C-11 was dealt with quite expeditiously in the other place. It received unanimous support. Although it was referred to the Veterans Affairs Committee of the other place, little discussion took place. The purpose of the motion to refer the bill to committee seemed to be aimed more at conforming to the rules of that place as opposed to any necessity of an in-depth inquiry. However, if it is the view of any honourable senator that the bill should be examined in committee, I would be only too happy to move the appropriate motion. In the meantime, I commend the bill to honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY BAN ON USE OF SACCHARIN—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator McDonald:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into and report upon the proposed ban on the use of saccharin.—(Honourable Senator Sullivan).

Senator Sullivan: Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand. By way of explanation, I point out that its subject is a scientific one. I am not prepared to accept what we have heard from the department. In view of my association with the scientific community, it is my intention to speak on this subject, which I will do at a later date. I trust at that time I will bring a breath of fresh air into the discussion of this so-called necessary measure.

Order stands.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 16, the debate on the consideration of the second report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I have on previous occasions, both inside and outside this chamber, expressed my sadness at the lack of appointments to this side—with a small “s”—of the chamber, and I reiterate that now. Nonetheless, I am pleased to extend a very warm welcome to the four new senators—some old friends and some new ones—all of whom have already established their worthiness of appointment to this chamber through their contributions to Canada, whether at the ethnic, local, provincial or national level.

[Translation]

First I should like to pay tribute to the co-chairman of the committee, my seatmate Senator Forsey, whose report is under consideration. His utmost diligence and the clear-headedness and ease with which he can pinpoint tendentious issues in statutory instruments are a precious help to all members of the committee. Moreover, his quick mind often allows us to pursue in a more lively fashion the often dull task we have been given. Let there be no illusion indeed, that committee is not the most interesting of all our committees. I therefore thank Senator Forsey and I unconditionally support his invitation to the Senate to consider this report.

[English]

Senator Godfrey has been one of the most assiduous members of the committee. His vast knowledge of the law has been invaluable, as his contribution to this debate amply demonstrates.

I was particularly pleased to listen to Senator Lang's contribution to this debate. He, too, is extensively learned in the law, and has the added benefit of not having been tainted, as the other three of us may have been, by the tediousness of the many meetings of the committee over the last two years and the laborious production of its reports. Senator Lang gave us several illustrations of the frightening growth of legislation of this kind both in Canada and abroad. I would like, if I may, to add one to his collection by quoting Lord Hailsham in the Richard Dimbleby Lecture of the BBC last fall, entitled “Elective Dictatorship,” as published in The Listener of October 21, 1976. He said this:

Consider the scale and range of modern government. The powers of government may have been tolerable when exercised in the limited manner, say, of 1911, or even of the years between the wars. But the same powers may well have become intolerable to the ordinary man and woman in 1976, by reason of the vast mass and detail of legislation, the range of its application and the weight of taxation which goes with it.

Consider two simple tests: the mass of annual legislation, and the size of the annual Budget. Before the First World War, the then Liberal government was content to pass a single slim volume of legislation in a year—and that, remember, was one of the great reforming administrations of the century. In 1911, there were not more than about 450 pages, and that was a heavy year. For 1975, there will probably be three volumes, each of about 1,000 pages, and each carrying with it an immense flow of subordinate legislation, amounting to about ten volumes of 1,000 pages each. So that when, at last, they have got around to printing it all, which they have not yet, there will be over 13,000 pages of legislation for a single year.

It must be remembered, moreover, that these changes are cumulative. Even allowing for repeals and amendments, those 13,000 pages of 1975 represent a huge addition to the corpus of British law, and that had already reached an all-time high by 1974.

While we have not asked yet for a page count of the corpus of Canadian law, there is no reason to believe that we are in a better shape than they are in England.

There is a case for subordinate legislation. It has been put in a recent editorial of the Financial Post, but it was put this way by Sir Harold Wilson in his review of his years in government:

Successive Governments of all parties had come to rely more and more on this kind of delegated legislation, for modern laws are inevitably complex, and detailed provisions, too complicated to be included in the principal act, have to be made by order. Moreover, as facts and requirements change, it is frequently necessary for the law to be altered to keep pace with them.

Well and good. Yet there is another aspect to it, and this was put by one of Sir Harold Wilson's own ministers, Richard Crossman, who states, in his Diaries of a Cabinet Minister, the following:

I celebrated my last Legislation Committee by having a blazing row about the Hovercraft. This is one of the Bills which I've demoted from the main programme and I'd given instructions that it may only be taken if it can be got through as a completely non-contentious measure before a Second Reading Committee. Whereupon the idiotic Board of Trade drafted a Bill which simply said that Hovercraft would be regulated by Order-in-Council. The argument of the draftsman was that as we don't know how Hovercraft behave we can't give instructions about them. But we must have some instructions because the first Hovercraft is going into service across the Channel this summer and nobody yet knows whether it is to be treated according to the laws applying to sea vessels or as a land vehicle or as an aeroplane. So some real thinking has to be done about the safety and security measures which will apply to Hovercraft. Yet here was the Ministry simply saying: “We won't bother to think about it. We'll simply have an enabling Bill and leave the thinking to our convenience.”

Honourable senators, I believe that this leaving of things to convenience, being the convenience of government or the convenience of civil servants, is what essentially grinds against Parliament and what Parliament has to grind back against.

Senator Lang also gave us a clear analysis of what he termed the obstructionism the committee had encountered, mostly at the hands of the Department of Justice. Honourable senators may be interested in knowing how this came about, and the position it has now reached.

Initially the committee thought that in questioning so many statutory instruments, it would be more efficient if each department of government designated an "instruments officer" with whom our counsel could establish liaison and rapport. After much prodding in some cases the departments complied, and taking naturally the line of least resistance all of them, I believe, appointed their own legal counsel as "designated instruments officers".

But, as it happens, the committee took its job seriously and its probings must have become somewhat annoying to some people. Some designated instruments officers discovered that they had a professional handicap. They could not give the committee legal opinions. And to make sure that everyone concerned was aware that they were handicapped, a proper notice was issued from headquarters acquainting them with their handicap. Soon the committee was being stonewalled on all fronts.

We then had a session or two with the Minister of Justice and his deputy at which they stood firm on their handicapped status. However, some time later the Minister of Justice formally offered a solution, which the committee had also given some thought to. The solution is the following—and I quote from a letter by the minister which is already part of the proceedings of the committee:

I have recommended to my colleagues in Cabinet a system which I believe is practical and will result in the Committee obtaining more complete information when it has questions related to statutory instruments.

I have proposed that departments and agencies nominate a senior official, perhaps at the deputy-minister level, to whom requests for explanations concerning statutory instruments would be directed. This official would then provide the requested explanations having regard to the department's policy and legal position. Naturally, in many cases there will be consultation between the department concerned and the Department of Justice. It must, however, be understood that the explanations provided, including any explanation as to the legality of the instrument, would be the sole responsibility of the responding department—

So, we will employ the new formula of by-passing the solicitor-client relationship and applying ourselves to the client, and he can deal with his own problems with his solicitor. The committee will now try this avenue. If it works, well and good. If it does not, we shall so report to you, to Parliament, and Parliament can take whatever action it may be able to take or may wish to take. I shall not go into the type of action that Parliament may take or may wish to take today, but the committee does offer a solution in section W of its report, and I commend its reading to honourable senators.

We have had in this debate and in the press and, indeed, in our report, a recital of the obstacles that the committee came up against, but that is not the full story. I feel the committee has accomplished some things, and even if as such it has no clout its existence has been productive, because in the process of seeking information from government we have achieved the following:

First, we have improved the availability of subordinate legislation in comprehensible form, and this is a continuing process. The publication of third subamendments now contains footnotes facilitating reference to initial regulations and intervening amendments. In some instances we have obtained the substitution of an entirely new regulation for amendment-bar-nacled items of subordinate legislation. This has not been easy, nor has it by any means been complete, but we like to think it is seeping into the system. The Privy Council has been generally willing to accommodate the committee's views on procedural aspects of publication in Part II of the Canada Gazette.

Second, the Privy Council has also agreed to publish in the future some classes of documents which have not heretofore been published.

Third, in terms of our criterion 1(b), much more attention is now being given to the statement in the preamble of statutory instruments of the enabling authority.

Fourth, the same thing applies to our criteria 3(a) and (b) concerning tabling provisions and clear statements of the time and manner of compliance with such provisions.

Fifth, obviously, in the process, we have discovered a few gross inconsistencies in substance and quite a number of inconsistencies as between the French and English texts. These have been readily corrected.

Finally, we have also received from departments many commitments for remedial action upon review of regulations and legislation.

In sum, the existence of the committee—that is, the presence of a watchdog—has already had some salutary effects on those whose responsibility it may be to initiate and to draft statutory instruments and regulations.

The committee recommends that certain legislative steps be taken to correct deficiencies which may be summarized as follows:

First, there is no system whereby all statutory instruments are published and made available to the committee charged by statute with their scrutiny. There is a system for regulations only and not for all statutory instruments, many of which are effectively hidden, are unpublished and are unknown even to the parliamentary committees to which they stand permanently referred.

Second, the definition of "statutory instrument" is obscure. The definition of "regulation," in terms of the exercise of a legislative power conferred by or under an act of Parliament, is equally obscure.

Third, there is no provision for a body to give a definitive ruling on whether a document is a statutory instrument. There is a procedure by which the Department of Justice can determine whether a statutory instrument is a regulation, but this is open to the objection that the parliamentary scrutiny committee is cut off from the decision.

The committee considers that the proper course is to amend the act to provide for a single class of statutory instruments, broadly defined. All documents in this class should be subject to uniform procedures, and any exceptions to the class, and hence to parliamentary scrutiny, should be specifically defined in the act.

The definition of "regulation-making authority" in the present act needs to be amended to make it accord with actual practice so that the committee will have disclosed to it the reasons for the coming into effect of regulations before registration.

May we ask the government to be prompt in giving attention to these matters?

As I stated earlier, the committee by itself has no clout. It has been given a mandate by both chambers of Parliament to scrutinize the regulations and other statutory instruments, and all it can do is report to both chambers.

I suggest, honourable senators, that to be effective we require the staunch support of our respective chambers. The first manifestation of that support could be the adoption of the committee's report. The report is now before us for consideration only. It is before the other place on a motion for concurrence. I suggest that the Senate should voice its adoption as well, and I invite the co-chairman from the Senate, immediately upon the conclusion of this debate, to move the formal adoption of the report, proceeding according to rule 45(1)(f).

I suggest also—and I can make suggestions only to this chamber, not to the other place—that the Senate and its committees, when considering legislation, be much more vigorous and tenacious than has been the case up to the present in rejecting the practice of indiscriminately legislating by regulation and in insisting that the regulations be known before a bill is passed.

I purposely refrained from referring to the $1 items in appropriations, because that matter has recently been debated here at length. I fully concur in the report's statement on this subject.

It seems to me, however, honourable senators, that there is nothing to prevent the Senate and its committees from attempting to bring about some degree of pre-application of the criteria which, as approved by the Senate, guide the special joint committee in its post facto scrutiny of the regulations and other statutory instruments.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, April 28, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., Honourable Maurice Bourget, P.C., Speaker pro tem in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Report of the Anti-Inflation Board to the Governor General in Council, pursuant to section 12(3) of the Anti-Inflation Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, regarding suppliers of commodities or services in (a) the logging industry and the wood industries, (b) the food retailing industry, the food wholesaling industry and the bakery products industries, and (c) the metal fabricating industries (except machinery and transportation equipment industries) who carry on business in the Province of British Columbia, dated April 12, 1977.

Copies of Order of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, respecting compensation plan between The Corporation of the Town of Fergus and the group of its policemen, represented by the Fergus Police Association. Order dated April 27, 1977.

Copies of correspondence between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premiers of the Province of Alberta, Quebec, Ontario and Nova Scotia concerning foreign ownership of land.

Copies of letters between the Premier of Alberta and the Prime Minister of Canada, dated October 14, 1976 and October 26, 1976, respectively, on economic development opportunities in Japan.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 3, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to give you a brief summary of the work we can expect in the Senate and its committees next week. I shall deal first with the committees.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet on Tuesday at 2.30 p.m. to continue its inquiry into the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

On Wednesday there will be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on the beef industry at 9 a.m. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is scheduled to sit at 9.30 a.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-16, and at 3.30 p.m. there will be a meeting of the National Finance Committee to consider the 1977-78 main estimates. The Standing Rules and Orders Committee and the Science Policy Committee will meet when the Senate rises.

On Thursday the National Finance Committee will hold another meeting on the Department of Public Works estimates at 9.30 a.m., and the Internal Economy Committee will meet in camera at 11 a.m. and the Agriculture Committee will continue with its inquiry into the beef industry at 3.30 p.m. or when the Senate rises.

In the Senate we shall proceed with the items now on the Order Paper. In addition it is expected that Bill C-39, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, will be passed by the Commons this week, so that we shall have it when we return on Tuesday next. The purpose of this bill is to extend, from the 1st day of July, 1977, to the 31st day of March, 1978, the period during which banks to which the Bank Act or the Quebec Savings Banks Act applies may carry on the business of banking.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: It is your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION

PERSONS LIVING IN CANADA UNDER DEPORTATION ORDERS OR CONTRARY TO COURT RULINGS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on April 26 Senator Ewasew made an inquiry with respect to a report made by a public servant by the name of Boris Domazet. I am referring to page 640 of Senate Hansard.

The Honourable Senator Ewasew stated that the report had been distributed at that time to a certain number of members of Parliament, and had received considerable attention in the press. His request was that the report be tabled in the Senate. I have now ascertained that the report is, really, a document authored by a private citizen, an individual known as Mr. Domazet. The report was sent in the form of a letter, with attachments, to a private member of Parliament. It was not tabled in the other chamber, and I can only suggest to honourable senators who may be interested in this particular letter that they contact the member of Parliament in question, in the other place, who may have additional copies available. It is in no sense an official document.

Senator Grosart: Who is the member?

Senator Perrault: I understand that it is Mr. Gray.

Senator Ewasew: The document in question authored by Mr. Domazet was brought to my attention simply because I know, after nine to ten years' experience with the Advisory Council on Manpower and Immigration, of the autocratic procedures sometimes activated by those in the Citizenship Section of that department; so much so that I felt that Domazet's objection should be made available to this house, if not formally then through the individual senators interested, seeing that he wrote the document, not as a private citizen but as a senior member of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, who has since been suspended for having written it. That is why I should like to have a copy of what I understand he circulated, according to the press reports, to 20 members of Parliament.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this is a precedent which has great ramifications. This report was authored by this individual. It is true that he is a former employee of one government department. I do not think it is appropriate to table a letter of this kind in the Senate. Certainly, that was not the inclination of the members of the other place. I can only repeat that those senators who are interested may wish to obtain a copy of that report, if copies are still available, either from Mr. Domazet directly or from the member of Parliament in the other place who apparently gave it to the press. I therefore think that the government properly resists the circulation and tabling of the document.

Senator Ewasew: The member of Parliament in question was Mr. Gray?

Senator Perrault: I understand that the member of Parliament who circulated the material is the Honourable Herb Gray. I can only pass along information which has been given to me.

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, I will now continue this privately, and I will contact Mr. Gray.

ENERGY

ACQUISITION OF OIL SUPPLIES FROM MEXICO—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning a visit to Mexico by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Don Jamieson. Press reports indicate that Mr. Jamieson is engaged in negotiating the acquisition of oil supplies from new Mexican production. Could the government leader tell us whether this is, in fact, the case, and, if so, (a) what quantity of oil will be imported into Canada from Mexico; (b) what will be the role of private companies in acquiring this oil, as they are the only refiners in this country; and (c) will Petro-Canada have a role in this matter?

Senator Perrault: Because of the detailed nature of the inquiry, I will take that question as notice.

Senator Flynn: What else is new?

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for the second reading of Bill C-2, to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure that we all listened with a great deal of attention yesterday to the speech given by the sponsor of the bill. Senator Molgat, in moving the motion for the second reading of the bill, provided us with a very comprehensive and concise statement, with the result that there is not a great deal left to say about the bill itself. I do not propose this afternoon to embark on an in-depth study; rather, I will make a few observations regarding the bill.

As Senator Molgat mentioned, the purpose of the bill is to assist producers of storable crops in all parts of Canada in marketing such crops in a much more orderly manner than has been the case to date. As most of us are aware, a farmer usually goes into debt to finance the production of a crop and is anxious to repay that debt as soon as possible. The result, of course, is that crops move on to the market in great supply at one time. In a situation such as that, of course, the price to the producer drops; later, when supplies become scarce, the price to the consumer increases. It is the middleman, of course, who reaps the benefit of increased prices, not the producer. For that reason it has become necessary to find a better method of marketing such crops, and in that respect a precedent was set for the marketing of wheat, oats and barley under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. Bill C-2 constitutes an extension of that concept to include storable crops in all parts of Canada.

It is evident that such a method would be far superior to the present situation. The producer would be able to obtain a loan, guaranteed in a certain way, and could then discharge the debt incurred as a result of the production of a given crop, thereby allowing him to market his crop over a period of time. This would result in a much more orderly marketing system with relatively stable prices. The farmer would receive a better return on his crop and, at the same time, the consumer would not be subject to exorbitant price increases.

Bill C-2 received a favourable reception. While everyone seems to be in favour of the principle, there has been some criticism of the mechanism by which this proposal is to be put into effect. As the sponsor pointed out, the government, under the proposed legislation, would guarantee any loans, within certain limits, made to individual producers by the producer organization. The money is borrowed in the first instance by the producer organization and loaned out by it to the individual producers. Clause 3 of the bill states:

This Act applies in respect of crops grown in Canada, except such wheat, oats and barley as are grown in the designated area as defined in the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

And those, of course, are already taken care of under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Clause 4(1) states:

Where an organization proposes to make an advance to a producer out of money borrowed from a bank for that purpose, the Minister may, on behalf of Her Majesty, on such terms and conditions as are prescribed and subject to this Act, guarantee to the organization the repayment of that advance, including interest thereon.

Criticism has been made of the fact that a producer must belong to an organization before he can take advantage of the bill. Under the definition clause, "organization" means an organization of producers, and "producer" means a producer who has actually produced a crop. I have not been able to find anything which says that an organization could not make a loan to a non-member. Normally, we would expect that the producer would belong to an organization. There has also been criticism that producers are being forced to belong to an organization. The bill does not say that a producer must belong to an organization in order to get a loan, but it could very well be, and the organization might not give it to him unless he did belong.

Clause 5(a) of the bill reads:

5. The Minister may give a guarantee to an organization under this Act only if

(a) he is satisfied that the producers to whom the organization proposes to make advances have produced a significant portion of the crop in question in the area represented by that organization—

What is meant by "significant portion"? There is nothing that I can find in the bill which in any way defines "significant portion". It has been suggested that this will be dealt with under the regulations.

It has been said that the government is setting up an intermediary between the lending institution and individual producers. That is true. It is setting up a producer organization, but I am not sure whether that organization must be made up of only producers, because as defined in the bill "producer" means a producer who has actually produced a crop, whereas some organizations include more than the actual producer; for example, an apple organization may include the growers, the packers, and so on.

Honourable senators, it does seem that this is a cumbersome method of making a loan. I would prefer to see the individual producer get a loan from a lending institution without going through any organization, and have the government make the guarantee to that lending institution. Why this has not been done, I do not know. I have read the proceedings of the other place fairly closely and I have not found any argument which convinces me that going through a producer organization is a better way than dealing on an individual basis.

Again, the point has been raised as to what is meant by an organization, because some of these organizations are loose associations of different people. It must be a legal organization, an organization which can sue or be sued. This is essential in that the money is going to be owed to the organization. It would be a simpler method to have a direct loan between the producer and the lending institution. In any of these matters, I believe the more simple you can keep it the better.

As provided in the bill, regulations will be made for various purposes. Now, it has been said here many times by different senators that it would be a good idea to have any regulations under a bill set out at the same time as the bill itself. Of course, the old answer has always been, "They can't actually make any regulations until the bill is passed." Well, they certainly could set out the proposed regulations, and in this way everyone would be better served than is the case now. This bill was introduced in the House of Commons on October 21 last and was debated at length there on October 27 and 28, February 16 and March 3. It was finally given third reading and passed on April 1. There were six committee hearings on December 2, 7, 8, 9, 14 and 16 and on March 3. In my opinion the matter has been discussed about as thoroughly as one could hope for. Admittedly, in the House of Commons committee the discussion ranged over more than just the bill, because they did go into agriculture generally. Because the bill has to do with agriculture, I expect that the very knowledgeable chairman of our Agriculture Committee will wish to make a few remarks on it, and I assume he will want it referred to his committee. I look forward to hearing from him on the subject.

Honourable senators, I believe we should support the bill and give it a try, at least. It may not be the best measure that can be devised, but it is better to have this than to have none at all. In any event, if it does not work we can amend it at a future date.

There is one other point. In my study of this bill, which relates to agriculture in general, I found in looking at the index in the latest revised Statutes of Canada that over 30 acts relate to agriculture. It is a cumbersome process to look up the various sections for those acts; indeed, it is difficult to find them. For that reason I would suggest that, if it is possible, there be a consolidation of those acts so that it will be simpler and easier in future to see just what acts apply to agriculture and to find them without too much difficulty when dealing with amending statutes.

In conclusion, honourable senators, may I say that I think we should pass this bill because it will certainly be helpful, and, as I mentioned, if the need arises we can make amendments to it in the future.

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, I should just like to make an observation or two with regard to the discourse just made by my confrere, Senator Macdonald. I, too, have gone through this material and I have come to the conclusion that, per se, the only reason for interposing an organization between the producer borrowing the money and the financial institution lending the producer the money, which is guaranteed by the government, is to ensure that there is sufficient collateral. One can only deduce this, but I feel that this is put in to permit the individual producer to borrow money who would otherwise not have the kind of collateral or financial backing to borrow money on his own. In that connection, if you look at clause 4 you will see that it is the organization to which the producer has to belong which proposes to make an advance to the producer. In other words, it is the organization which is taking the financial risk. It is the one really doing the borrowing and it then goes on to make the money available to the producer. I agree that it would be better to simplify it and have the loan made directly to the producer. However, I then have a question with respect to clause 3. I was going to ask the question yesterday, but the adjournment of the debate was moved. Clause 3 says that the act applies in respect of crops, and then makes an exception of wheat, oats and barley. Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) indicated why that is so. That removes the greater part of the western provinces from the bill. It is necessary to go back to the definition of "crops," under which mainly grains, oilseeds and root crops are left. That is perhaps why the eastern and maritime provinces are more likely to benefit from this bill. It is mainly to their advantage.

The bill appears on the face of it to be cumbersome in that the producer has to belong to an organization that can be sued and can sue, which may be of benefit because otherwise a small producer may not be able to obtain a loan.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I should like to ask a question of the sponsor of the bill (Senator Molgat) or Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), which perhaps could be answered at a later stage. I wondered whether the producers' organization that is interposed between the actual borrower and the financial institution lending the money will supply any services in connection with the loan, such as inspection services, and also whether a charge is to be made for those services. If that information is not available now, perhaps it could be given at the committee stage.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I can reply to the first part of the question. The bill does not impose any obligation on the producers' organization to provide a service. However, because they are interested in the loan and are supplying at least a partial guarantee, an obligation of sorts is imposed to protect their own interests. This is based on the original act dealing with prairie farm grain advances, in which it was handled through grain companies, who were in a sense the issuing agent, because farmers delivered their grain there. The Canadian Wheat Board was involved as the body controlling the sale of grain, so there was in essence a type of service provided, because they ensured that the grain was in fact there and was properly stored. Beyond that there is no obligation.

The honourable senator also asked if there is a charge for the service. I do not believe there is one. The bill does not say anything about it, to my knowledge. I am not sure whether the failure of the bill to say anything about it would allow them to make a charge. I will check that. My impression is that there would be no charge.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

LABOUR RELATIONS

EFFECTS ON THE ECONOMY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marchand, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to certain fundamental problems which preoccupy Canadians, namely, problems of labour relations in the country and certain related problems of economic order.—(Honourable Senator McElman).

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I should draw your attention to the fact that this inquiry is standing in my name because of my responsibilities, during Senator Petten's absence, as acting whip unpaid. If any honourable senator wishes to pursue this debate, he should proceed.

Senator Phillips: And if he does not want to pursue it?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Senator Deschatelets): As no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 3, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 3, 1977

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

BANK ACT QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-39, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Capital Budget of The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1977-896, dated March 30, 1977, approving same.

Copies of Order of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, respecting compensation plan between The Corporation of the City of Brantford and its employee group composed of its Fire Chief and Deputy Fire Chief. Order dated April 29, 1977.

Report of the Department of the Environment for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1976, pursuant to section 7 of the Department of the Environment Act, Part I of Chapter 42, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

PRAIRIE PROVINCES

DROUGHT CONDITIONS—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning the worsening drought conditions being reported from the prairie provinces. There is a real concern on the part of prairie farmers about ground water and dust conditions, and the prospects at the moment are among the worst since the 1930s.

I ask the Leader of the Government:

(a) What are the prospective conditions for grain growing and agricultural crops in the prairie provinces?

(b) What is the current situation with respect to water?

(c) Is there any estimate at this time of a possible reduction in grain quantities in the 1977 crop year? If such a reduction in crop prospects is on the horizon, what might this do to grain prices?

● (2010)

Senator Smith (Colchester): Mr. Whelan is going to pray for rain, I think.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate the fact that Senator Austin provided prior notice of this inquiry, in the form of a letter, so I have replies to some of his questions. These are important questions for all Canadians.

His first question was: What are the prospective conditions for grain growing and agricultural crops in the prairie provinces?

At the moment, summer fallow crops are expected to be near normal. This could deteriorate, but with the present level of moisture we can expect the yield to be near normal. Stubble crop yields will be 50 per cent to 60 per cent from normal.

The honourable senator's second question was: What is the situation with respect to water, and is there any estimate as to a possible reduction in grain quantities in the 1977 crop year?

Water conditions, particularly in the southern part of the prairies and northwestern part of Ontario, are very low. Any rains, unless a complete torrential downpour, will not fill in streams and reservoirs. The water situation, as far as livestock is concerned, is serious at this moment for ranchers who have cattle out on the range, and if they are dependent on dugouts or shallow wells for water they could have problems. Shallow wells are 100 to 200 feet deep.

We may have to have some emergency or contingency plans to either take cattle to water or, if possible, to pipe water to them where they are being pastured. If they must be taken to water, feed will have to be taken also. The cabinet is considering what emergency plans might be put in place, in cooperation with the provinces.

The situation is also serious for communities on shallow wells, where they are also experiencing difficulty.

The third question was: Are there parallel situations existing in the United States? Yes, particularly in states bordering Canada.

The fourth question was: If reduced crops induce hay and normal animal food such as corn, what will ranchers do with respect to production of beef cattle?

There is little corn grown in western Canada, and practically none for cattle fodder. Provincial governments are requesting producers to plant oats for grain feed if their hay production looks as if it may be inadequate for winter feeding. Oats grow well in northern Canada.

Lastly, the honourable senator asked: Can we predict what ranchers will do with respect to the production of beef cattle, and what is the prospect for prices in these commodities for the Canadian consumer?

The government would not want to see the ranchers lose their basic breeding herds, and will be considering measures to ensure that there will be no particular glut on the market.

Senator Flynn: What are the prospects for rain?

Senator Langlois: Let us pray.

Senator Perrault: I have no report on the precipitation situation from Environment Canada, but I think all of us should hope and pray for rain in those areas that are affected by this drought condition.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if the only policy of the government in this very serious crisis is to pray for rain.

Senator Flynn: They always pray.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps, as has been said, people and government should work as if everything depended on them, and pray as though everything depended upon God!

Senator Smith (Colchester): Does the Leader of the Government not know that it is only the prayers of the righteous that avail?

Senator Walker: Also, faith without good works is dead.

ROYAL EMBLEMS

REMOVAL OF CROWN FROM GOVERNOR GENERAL'S PRIVATE RAILWAY CARS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a reply to another question. The Honourable Senator Forsey asked—

Senator Flynn: About the painting of rail cars.

Senator Perrault: Yes. The honourable Leader of the Opposition possesses total recall. The question was: I should like to ask whether there is any truth in the story, of which I was credibly informed this morning, that the Crown on the side of the Governor General's private railway cars has been painted out or painted over.

The answer to that question is: Transport Canada was advised November 4, 1976, that His Excellency the Governor General would not be using the cars during the remaining years of his term. No savings could be made by laying up the cars and it was decided instead to make the cars available for users numbering eight or more.

It was considered inappropriate under the circumstances to leave the Crown on the car and, while the cars were next in Montreal for maintenance, the Crown was painted over for this interim period only.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill C-2, intituled: "An Act to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops".—(Honourable Senator Argue).

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with respect to the first item on the Orders of the Day I would say that I had a conversation this afternoon with the Honourable Senator Argue, who has been delayed in western Canada and is not able to be present this evening. Senator Argue urges that we proceed with the second reading debate on Bill C-2.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean to put the question?

Senator Molgat: No, the question has been put. I would be closing the debate if I proceed now.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Molgat speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of Bill C-2.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, first of all, I thank those honourable senators who participated in this debate. I shall endeavour to cover some of the points that were raised.

Senator Macdonald, in speaking on the bill, adequately covered some of the problem areas—and I recognize them as being problem areas. He mentioned in particular the definition of "significant portion of the crop" and how that should be determined. While recognizing that this would be included in the regulations, he made the point that honourable senators on many occasions have objected to bills which leave matters to be dealt with by way of regulation.

The difficulty in the present situation is that it is not easy to foretell at this time how much use will be made of the legislation, and what the producer organizations themselves might wish to have included in the regulations. It is understood—and I repeat this point, which I made in my introductory speech—that it is definitely the intention of the department to have discussions with producer groups prior to bringing the regulations into force. They will have an opportunity to voice their own views with respect to "significant portion" and any other matters in the regulations. That is a commitment on the part of the department, and I am satisfied that it will be carried out. In the circumstances, because of uncertainty as to the type of regulations necessary, I believe it is the best manner in which to proceed.

A further question was asked by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) who, in the first part, asked whether there was to be any service provided by the producer organization. It is my understanding that there is no obligation to provide service, but it must be the organization that borrows the money and advances it to the producer. The second part of Senator Connolly's question had reference to charges. There is nothing in the bill providing for any charges by the producer organization to the producer who seeks an advance. I am advised, however, that while the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, which has been on the statute books for some time, does not provide specifically for any charge, it is understood that the elevator companies may levy a small charge—I believe the maximum is $5—if they wish to do so, to cover their cost of completing the documentation required for the advance itself.

There does not appear to be any clear pattern on the part of the elevator companies so far as that charge is concerned. I am advised that while some do charge it, others do not. There is certainly no obligation to do so under the act. It would appear that in most instances there is no charge. Presumably, the same rules would apply under this bill. If there were to be a charge, it would be a minimal one, and certainly there is no obligation to make such a charge. The purpose of Bill C-2 is to provide interest-free advances on storable crops. That being so, it would surely not provide at the same time for a substantial charge in respect of such advances.

Although the experience under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act was not raised specifically during the course of the debate, it might be useful if I were to outline some of the history. The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, of course, has been exceedingly successful. As proof, one need only look at the figures, particularly in the first year of operation. At that time there were 190,000 permit book holders in the area covered by the Canadian Wheat Board, 122,000 of whom applied for advance payments under the act. It was obvious from the response that the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act was badly needed, and that it filled a vacuum in providing cash advances to farmers at a time of substantial difficulty in marketing their crops because of world grain conditions. It is interesting to note, too, that the amount of default has been very small indeed. Advances in that first year totalled more than $272 million, covering a total crop value of $853 million, and the default on those advances amounted to only $734,000.

In the year 1974-75, which is the latest year for which figures are available, out of 159,000 permit book holders, only 14,000 applied for advances. Some $46 million was advanced in that year to prairie grain farmers under the interest-free provisions of that act. Again, the number of defaults remained low.

The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act became law some nine years ago, and has proved successful. It has satisfied a serious need in the area covered by the Canadian Wheat Board. This new law, which extends to other crops and to all of Canada, will, I am sure, meet needs in the same way when marketing conditions may be difficult for certain crops, or in the peak season when the transportation system is unable to cope with the sudden increase of produce on the market.

Honourable senators, I am pleased that there has been general support expressed by those who have spoken on second reading. It is my hope that the bill will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, where officials of the Department of Agriculture will be available to go into further details.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Molgat, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY BAN ON USE OF SACCHARIN—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 27, the debate on the motion of Senator Buckwold that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into and report upon the proposed ban on the use of saccharin.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, it is not in any perfunctory manner that I wish to express to you my sincere thanks for your indulgence in allowing me to postpone this debate so that I might more adequately present my views on this subject.

Before coming to the main theme of my presentation, I should like to take this opportunity of thanking the Leader of the Government and my own deputy leader, Senator Grosart, for their kind remarks pertaining to myself a week ago. To you, Madam Speaker, I offer my warm respects and to all the new senators I also offer my felicitations. As the ranks of the government have been so badly depleted they need to be reinforced.

Having said that I will be very explicit and brief. I will define one word, the word "mutation." In biology we mean by that a permanent transmissible change in the characteristics of an offspring from those of its parent.

As one who has been personally engaged in experimental medical research for years on both rats and dogs and on rhesus monkeys, I was astounded when I heard and read the dogmatic conclusions of the Department of National Health and Welfare, which they arrived at as a result of simple experiments on rats, of what they propose to do to the Canadian population. Immediately, the Federal Drug Administration in Washington followed suit. Why? Because of a law on their books which has not been changed since 1958.

I wish to congratulate Senator Buckwold on a most able presentation, and an accumulation of medical references that do him credit. But I was also in agreement with my colleague, Senator Grosart, when in no uncertain terms he refuted Senator Buckwold's attempt—and this is the only mistake I find in Senator Buckwold's presentation—his attempt to chastise the credibility of the scientific community. I refute that attempt. As a matter of fact, the scientific community neither asked for nor sought this type of investigation. Probably, if they had wished to carry it out they would not have been able to do so because the funds of the Medical Research Council have been so badly depleted.

Senator McDonald, in my opinion, gave a most able presentation. He left no question of how he felt or what he meant. I can differ with him only in the regard that the problem, as I stated before, has been blown out of all proportion and does not need to be referred to a committee at the present time.

Perhaps you read this headline in the Globe and Mail this morning: "No Longer a Cancer Worry, Cyclamates may return to the Shelves." They banned them eight years ago, but now they will be putting them back on the shelves very shortly, as they are in Washington.

Senator McDonald, I am much more interested in the disease of hundreds of thousands of pancreases than I am with the problem of obesity, which is a manifestation of one of two causes: either a glandular dysplasia cause or overeating. The latter can be overcome by discipline.

One experimental group using rats has "proved" that saccharin is dangerous to humans. But years of use by humans has indicated no one documented instance of harmful effects on humans.

I have had a great deal to do with experimental research. I am a little surprised that Dr. Morrison and his co-workers did not give adequate credit to the two men at McMaster University with whom they consulted in this particular regard. But I am not surprised that they did not consult the man who is probably the foremost authority on the result of additives and their effects on the human body and on the development of cancer, Dr. Bruce of the Princess Margaret Institute. Dr. Bruce states:

An additive such as saccharin has never been proved to be mutagenic which is an indication of being of or a carcinogenic change.

I also bring to the honourable senators' attention a paper by Irving I. Kessler, Director of the Research Group of Johns Hopkins University, on his investigation of the effect of saccharin. I have received a reprint from him personally, a courtesy which has been expended to me by many others. His paper is entitled: "Non-Nutritive sweeteners and Human Bladder Cancer: Preliminary findings." I will read only the abstract.

The non-nutritive sweeteners, saccharin and cyclamate, were not associated with the risk of human bladder cancer in a controlled investigation. The prior intake of such sweeteners in any and all forms was not greater or more prolonged among 209 recently diagnosed bladder cancer patients than among 209 otherwise similar patients without bladder disease. These findings were unaffected by case-control differences in diabetic histories—

In a personal note to me he further states:

The data in this paper refer to preliminary findings on the first 418 patients in our study. The total number of subjects (1,038) included 519 bladder cancer cases and 519 demographically similar controls.

The as yet unpublished findings in the 1,038 subjects appear to be about as negative with respect to the effect of artificial sweeteners as in the preliminary report. We have not yet completed our examination of the separate effects of cyclamate and saccharin. However, if either were positively associated with bladder cancer, the present findings should have revealed this. In fact, they have not.

That was Johns Hopkins University speaking. In his findings, Dr. Kessler made specific reference to the work of Dr. B. Armstrong and Dr. R. Doll in England, and pointed out that they "found no evidence of a break in the continuity of the time trends in bladder cancer mortality among Britons corresponding to the introduction or use of saccharin through 1972."

Personally, I am very much more interested in and concerned about the dire consequences of the hundreds of thousands of diseased pancreases of people with diabetes than I am with the questionable development of a carcinogenic change in the bladder of rats. Senator McDonald, you have your diabetes and I have my bladder condition, but I have a greater concern for your pancreas than for this so-called dogmatic statement of the production of a questionable lesion in the bladder of rats.

According to the April 1977 issue of the Science journal—and I hope that some of our departmental officials are here—the American Cancer Society, at its meeting in Sarasota, joined the fracas over saccharin and cast its lot with those who want the artificial sweetener to stay.

Part of the report reads as follows:

"As a major voluntary health agency whose primary responsibility is cancer, the American Cancer Society is vitally concerned with the general health and well-being of the public. Saccharin is of great value in dietetic food, used to help control diabetes and obesity, which afflict tens of millions of Americans and pose more immediate danger than the possible carcinogenicity of saccharin. Banning saccharin may cause great harm to many citizens while protecting a theoretical few," society president R. Lee Clark declared at the American Cancer Society annual writers' seminar here. Acknowledging that the Food and Drug Administration acted "properly" under the law in proposing to ban saccharin, Clark, who is head of the M.D. Anderson Hospital and Tumor Institute in Houston and a member of the President's Cancer Panel, went on to say: "The Delaney Amendment has served the public well but, as more sophisticated and quantitative technology becomes available, issues of dosage, cost-benefit, risk-benefit, and the predictability of animal data to potential impact in people must be further and better evaluated." Clark emphasized that "there is no evidence that saccharin causes cancer in humans."

Honourable senators, that is why at the present moment we are not ready, with the scientific information we have at hand, to refer this problem to a committee, which would result in considerable expense to the taxpayer. Look at what was in the Globe and Mail this morning.

There is at present no direct evidence that saccharin causes cancer in humans. A former federal drug administrator, Commissioner Alexander M. Schmidt, recently stated:

Our scientific capacities to detect chemical residues have in many cases outstripped our scientific ability to interpret their meaning.

● (2040)

Similarly, there are questions about the interpretation of the Canadian data and their applicability to man.

The Office of Technology Assessment in the United States has stated:

We badly need the kind of careful, objective and balanced assessment which this body has agreed to undertake.

Specifically, they have been asked to:

1. Determine the validity of applying data from animal experiments to human beings.
2. Evaluate and quantify, if possible, the potential risk that saccharin poses to human beings.
3. Assess the potential benefits of saccharin, especially to diabetics, persons with heart disease, obesity, or other medical problems.
4. Report on the potential availability of alternative artificial sweeteners.

Some of these findings can be predicted. On the first point it will be said that we cannot be certain that something that causes tumours in rats will cause tumours in man, but that it is reasonable to make the extrapolation. Assuming the rat data do apply to people, the opinion of statisticians will be that while the risk cannot be quantified it can be said to be small but real.

What reviews have been made of the matter suggest that while it is not necessary for the care of patients with diabetes or other disorders, saccharin or some form of artificial sweetener certainly has some value in making life more tolerable from a dietary point of view. I do not mean that after two drinks of Scotch you should have dinner and put saccharin in your coffee. In addition, saccharin is used as an additive in many prescription drugs which, pharmacologists say, would have to be "reconstituted" were the sweetener to be prohibited. This is most important.

As to the alternatives to saccharin, it is safe to say that none is available right now. The Department of National Health and Welfare in Canada, and the FDA in the United States, must review the information they have received, and only after that can they force saccharin products off the shelves. As one scientific writer has stated, "Both these departments have opened a Pandora's box and fallen into a fine kettle of fish." But not by accident.

There are several aspects of this governmental banning of saccharin that are disturbing. In particular, the way that the government has managed this matter leaves much to be desired. Either the Canadian government has realized a major scientific discovery, or it is going to be the laughingstock of the scientific world. There is very real reason to believe that the latter may prove to be the case.

I wonder why the Government of Canada has not followed the normal practice on such scientific matters by having the results of its research published in a scientific publication, thereby subjecting it to scientific review, analysis and criticism before taking such definitive and severe action?

I wonder why the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his press release indicated that he had consulted the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Dental Association, the Canadian Diabetic Association and other professional and scientific groups, only to have the statement repudiated by the Canadian Dental Association. Indeed, we have learned through questioning by the opposition in the other place that there was no consultation in the true sense of the word, but that these groups were simply called in a few days before the government's announcement and briefed on findings and intended governmental action.

I am informed that the President of the Canadian Medical Association has been asked to seek expert consultation to review the scientific evidence for the banning of saccharin so that he may report appropriately to the near future annual meeting of the CMA on this matter. Think of that.

I wonder why the assistant deputy minister who heads the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare appears to have been appointed as an official spokesman for government policy on this matter. I note that he appeared on the CBC television program Front Page Challenge to defend the government's action, which, at least, has major political overtones to it.

Honourable senators, there is very little in the way of scientific, documented literature available on the subject. I believe that the government research officers should have published the results of their research and had it subjected to scientific review prior to such severe action being taken. It is impossible for us to discuss such a highly technical subject in any meaningful manner until such time as the experiments and the data have been subjected to scientific review. I suggest that in the interim the status of Canada's scientific community is in serious jeopardy. In these circumstances, I cannot help but suggest that the action taken by the government has been premature and precipitate, and is an over-reaction based on unsubstantiated and inadequate scientific review.

I wish to conclude with the opinions of two of the outstanding scientists in the world. They happen to be Canadians. First, Dr. Kenneth Fergusson, former director of the Connaught Laboratories, when the Connaught Laboratories were the Connaught Laboratories, states:

It is amazing to me that such a final and serious verdict should be perpetrated on 22 million Canadians or those that use saccharin as a result of an experiment on rats.

Secondly, Dr. Charles Best, the very distinguished co-Nobel Laureate, the co-discoverer of insulin with the late Sir Frederick Banting, has said:

I do not accept the conclusion that as a result of this experiment diabetics should discontinue using saccharin, and much further work has to be done.

As a matter of fact, he advocates that they continue to do so.

Honourable senators, thank you for your attention and patience. I love a scientific paper. In view of all this scientific evidence, this particular problem should not be referred to a committee until further epidemiological studies have been concluded.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jacques Flynn rose pursuant to notice of April 27:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the question of the appointment of senators.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, if I have felt it necessary to draw the attention of the Senate to the question of the appointment of senators, and I mean more specifically the appointment of Progressive Conservative senators, it is because of certain recent statements made by the Prime Minister and the government leader in this house.

So far I have commented on this question in a general way only without making reference to the conversations and the correspondence that took place with them. I did so for very simple reasons.

First, traditionally, appointments to the Senate have always been the prerogative of the Prime Minister. Although he may consult his cabinet colleagues he has the last word.

Second, it has been the tradition also for the Prime Minister to invite supporters of the government in power to sit here.

Third, I admit that in practice the opposition could not and cannot demand anything in that respect, except perhaps to argue that there must be a certain balance in the representation of parties in this house and in that respect the official opposition must be able to carry out its responsibilities.

So if I raise this question I want to make it clear that it is not in the sole interest of the Progressive Conservative Party that I do so, but in the interest of the Senate.

Because in more than 40 years the Liberal Party has been in power for over 34 years, and the Conservative Party for a little less than six years, that tradition has resulted in an evident imbalance in favour of the Liberal Party. Suffice to recall that in 1957 when the Diefenbaker government came to power there were only five Conservative senators against 78 Liberals plus one independent Liberal and two independents. There were 16 vacancies. Mr. St. Laurent had invited a Conservative friend of his, John T. Hackett, to sit here. It will also be remembered how furious the Liberals were that he did not fill the 16 vacancies at that time before calling the 1957 election. It is certain that Mr. St. Laurent was already concerned over that imbalance and that is one of the reasons which led him not to fill those vacancies.

With the advent of the Progressive Conservative government, the imbalance was partially corrected up to 1963 when Mr. Pearson became Prime Minister.

At that time, the distribution of parties in the Senate was as follows: 36 Progressive Conservatives, one independent Progressive Conservative, 59 Liberals, two Independent members and three vacancies.

As you know, the present distribution is as follows: 15 Progressive Conservatives, 74 Liberals, two independent members, one Social Credit Party member, one independent Liberal and 11 vacancies.

I believe it is recognized that the present distribution of seats in this chamber is inadequate, even though it is not as alarming as it was back in 1957. At the present time, the Senate assumes more responsibilities than before, especially through the work carried out by its various committees.

This is why public opinion is more concerned by the policy that the Prime Minister follows or should follow when appointing senators.

[English]

Honourable senators, the Prime Minister and the Government Leader in the Senate have made recent statements which seem to indicate that the only reason the opposition forces have dwindled so in the Senate is that the official opposition refuses to conform to certain simple rules set down by the Prime Minister pertaining to the replacement of Tory senators by Tories. Therefore, I think the time has come to shed some light on this matter and bring into the public arena a discussion which has gone on privately for some seven years.

Because references have been made by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Government in the Senate to discussions and correspondence with me, I feel I am at liberty to recall the details of such conversations and to quote from the correspondence.

The first discussion I had with the Prime Minister on the subject of replacing Tory senators with Tory appointments was in October 1970, at the Governor General's Ball preceding the opening of the 1970-72 session. At that time, Senators Aseltine, Gladstone, Hollett, J. J. MacDonald and Pearson were thinking of retiring but were interested in knowing if there was any hope of their being replaced by Tories. The Prime Minister's comment to me at that time was that he was prepared to summon some Tories to replace Conservative senators who retired. He was not very specific but suggested that he would certainly do something.

Well, the senators I have mentioned retired: Senators Aseltine, Gladstone, Hollett and Pearson on March 31, 1971, and Senator MacDonald on April 19, 1971. I mention the cases of these senators because they fulfilled the "voluntary retirement" prerequisite set down by the Prime Minister if he were to replace Conservative senators with Conservative appointees. The senators had been appointed for life. None of them had to retire. Their retirements were, therefore, voluntary. But, as you know, none of these senators were replaced by a P.C. senator.

Yet, in 1974, on October 2, when the Prime Minister participated in the Throne Speech debate, he had this to say concerning the Senate and appointments:

Hon. members opposite talk about partisan appointments. This is a serious matter which I have already had the opportunity to discuss several years ago with the authorities of opposition parties, and I had then suggested, and I repeat my suggestion today, that if indeed the senators of the Progressive Conservative party, of the Tory party, who wish to retire from the upper chamber, refrain from doing so because they do not want to be replaced by Liberal senators, I repeat what I told several years ago to Senator Flynn, who, if I am not mistaken, represents the opposition party in the Senate—

I interject here to say that I have for some time now.

—that, for my part, I would readily appoint Progressive Conservatives to replace the Progressive Conservatives who voluntarily retire from the upper chamber. I am well aware, Mr. Speaker, that some of them accept my suggestion, but there were many more when I first made this offer several years ago, and if the official opposition party continues to act so speedily, they may be even fewer in four years.

By his own admission, the Prime Minister was repeating what he had said to me in 1970. But he did not explain why, in the four years between 1970 and 1974, he had not replaced with Tories the Conservative senators who had voluntarily retired from the Senate.

After the Prime Minister's 1974 statement about replacing those senators of ours who would voluntarily retire, I had a talk with Senator Perrault about this, which conversation I later summarized in a letter to him dated November 15, 1974. I explained in that letter that if the Prime Minister's promise meant that one of our senators had to retire before a Progressive Conservative replacement could be appointed, that indicated that our number was never to rise beyond what is was at that time, namely, 17. I did not mention it to him, but it was also clear that our number would further decline if the assurance did not apply to those who might die in office. I also pointed out that that would afford us very little help, and reminded him of those who had voluntarily retired between 1970 and 1974, and who were not replaced by Tories as promised.

Senator Perrault's reply was not swift in coming. It arrived three months later in February of 1975. The gist of it was that the government was only prepared to replace those Conservative senators who voluntarily retired. There was no question of increasing the number of Tories beyond 17, where it stood at that point. Here I underline again the fact that this maximum was illusory because of possible further vacancies created by death. Senator Perrault also told us that if we expected Tories to be replaced by Tories, we would have to supply lists of names. He wrote:

● (2100)

The P.M. is prepared to do so—

That is, replace Tory senators with Tory appointees.

—on the basis that if a list of five candidates to succeed any sitting Progressive Conservative is submitted to the P.M. and the P.M. indicates that at least one of such candidates is acceptable, then the Government would feel itself under an obligation to appoint an acceptable candidate from the submitted list within a reasonable time after the resignation or intervening death of the Senator in question.

You note now that mention is made of replacement in cases of vacancies created by death, contrary to the Prime Minister's statement of October 2, 1974, in the House of Commons. The letter went on:

If one of ours retired or died without such a list having been submitted, the P.M. would not feel bound to replace him with a Tory.

Four months later, in July 1975, Senator Perrault wrote to me again, repeating that:

If the P.M., prior to a particular vacancy occurring, has not received from the Leader of your Party a list of candidates from which the P.M. has decided that at least one is acceptable to him, then the Government has stated that it will not be obliged to protect any such vacancy in your Party's ranks in the Senate for an appointment from your Party.

Note again that there is no distinction here between vacancies created by death and vacancies created by retirement, and that there is no reference to voluntary retirement.

Two days later I replied to the July 15 letter of Senator Perrault, underlining, once again, that it was unfortunate that the Prime Minister should be prepared to guarantee only the status quo and not provide us with a greater number in the Senate. I agreed that it was fair of the Prime Minister, in the case of resignation, to expect that we might supply him with a list of five possible replacements prior to the senator's actually resigning. But, with regard to those of ours who might die in office, I had this to say:

The case of vacancies created by death, however, presents a serious problem. Any one of us might die at any time. What therefore we are being asked to do to ensure that our number not fall below seventeen, is to supply the P.M. now——with a list of five possible replacements for each Progressive Conservative senator.

And I underlined the word "now".

This is totally impractical.

What it meant, since none of us knows when he is going to die, is that to make sure Tories were replaced by Tories we would have to supply lists for every Tory in the Senate, whether he were in his 70s or in his 50s, whether he had two or twenty years to go.

I suggested that, in the case of death, the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons be given one month after the senator's death to come up with a list of possible replacements.

Senator McElman: Or give a guarantee not to die.

Senator Flynn: Of course, that would be a solution.

That suggestion was not considered worthy by the Prime Minister. His reply came in October of 1975 in the form of a curt one-paragraph letter from Senator Perrault, which said:

The Government has given careful consideration to the proposal regarding the appointment of Progressive Conservative senators to fill vacancies created in your ranks through death. At this time, the Government is not in a position to guarantee a minimum of seventeen Progressive Conservative senators or any other number. A system is proposed, however, by which Progressive Conservative senators who wish to resign can be assured of successors from Progressive Conservative ranks. In other words, the offer, at this time, applies to voluntary retirement.

So as of October 1975, the offer of replacement applied only to those who retired voluntarily and no longer to those who died in office, and the minimum of 17 was gone.

More recently, in January of this year, to be exact—the government leader made some public statements which gave rise to some question marks. In a Canadian Press article on January 19, 1977, the following paragraphs come at the end of the story:

Senator Perrault said the Government is willing to increase opposition representation in the Senate so that one-quarter to one-third are opposition members.

This would mean early appointment of perhaps six Conservatives to fill vacancies—but Opposition Leader Joe Clark has not suggested any names, he said.

Senator Perrault: That is a press report.

Senator Flynn: I agree. I do not say the press always reports correctly. I am just putting the facts on the record so as to clarify the situation as much as I can.

An article by Paul Jackson on Alberta Senate appointments, at about the same time, quotes an official of the Prime Minister's Office as saying:

While the Alberta situation may not quite fit into the guidelines suggested months ago by Mr. Trudeau, anyone can make a representation to the P.M. urging that a certain person be seriously considered for appointment to the Senate. Considering that Mr. Clark is from Alberta and that the vacancy has been there for almost six years, one can assume that the Prime Minister would very seriously consider a recommendation by Mr. Clark.

Let me start with Senator Perrault's statement about the government's desire to raise our number to between one-quarter and one-third of the Chamber. This is a completely new approach, bearing in mind the position taken in the 1975 correspondence, which said that the policy was only to replace Conservative senators who retire voluntarily. Then the government leader was quite clear that the Prime Minister had no intention of raising our number but only maintaining it, and only if vacancies did not occur as a result of death, a factor which is difficult to control, you will have to admit.

Let me deal with the statement by the official in the Prime Minister's Office referred to by Paul Jackson. The vacancy referred to had been created in 1971 by Senator Gladstone's resignation. There had been no question at that time of the submission of a list of names by the Leader of the Opposition. That requirement of presubmission of names only came about in 1975. But if the Prime Minister wanted lists of names for those Tory senators who voluntarily retired in 1971 and 1972 and who were never replaced, why did he not just ask for them?

More recently still, the leader of our party inquired of the Prime Minister if he had any intention of replacing Senator Fred Blois, who retired last October, with a Tory. The Prime Minister referred to the two conditions set down previously—voluntary retirement, a condition posed in 1970, and a presubmission of names before the resignation, a condition posed in 1975. There not having been a presubmission of names in the case of Senator Blois, even though it was a voluntary retirement, the Prime Minister apparently does not feel compelled to replace Senator Blois with a Tory. The fact is that there had been no presubmission of names in the case of Senator Welch. Yet he was replaced by Senator Ike Smith, and for that we are very grateful.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: So, with all these apparent contradictions facing us, I decided to write anew to the government leader in the Senate. On March 2 of this year, I asked:

(a) Is it the P.M.'s intention to replace with P.C. supporters only those P.C. senators who retire voluntarily?

I asked this because of Senator Perrault's assertion in January of this year that the Prime Minister really wanted to raise opposition ranks to one-third of the Senate.

(b) What precisely is meant by voluntary retirement?

The term was first used by the Prime Minister in 1970. It suddenly dawned on me that perhaps the Prime Minister had his own very personal explanation of what the term meant. I had taken it for granted that it meant any retirement that was voluntary—that is, where one was not forced by law or by the angel of death to retire. As I see it, any senator appointed for life who retires does so voluntarily. But it could be argued that a life senator who retires at 75, because he has given notice that he would be retiring upon reaching that age, was not retiring voluntarily. On the other hand, a senator appointed until he reaches the age of 75, would retire voluntarily if he did so one day before reaching that age, but would not if he waited until he reached that age.

I also wanted to know, since it had not been required in the case of Senator Smith's appointment, if the presubmission of names was still a requirement. I suggested, in addition, that if the Prime Minister were really interested in giving us appointments, he might very simply indicate where there were vacancies and that Mr. Clark would supply him, within 30 days, with a list of names from which to choose a candidate for that area.

I have not yet received a reply from Senator Perrault, but I think my questions were answered in part in a letter dated March 18 to Mr. Clark from the Prime Minister. This is not a confidential letter, by the way. In it, the Prime Minister repeats that the first condition for a Tory senator to be replaced by a Tory is "voluntary retirement," which he explains as "retirement before it is forced by the mandatory age limit of 75, or by death." Death resurfaces again, although it was previously ruled out as an occasion for P.C. replacement. This definition of voluntary retirement is still very obscure.

Now, the Prime Minister in that letter to Joe Clark, mentioned a second condition which resembles that set down in 1975, but which is not quite the same. He says the second requirement is: "That notice be given prior to the actual resignation." He does not say that notice must be given prior to death. He makes no mention here of the presubmission of a list of names which was the requirement set down in 1975. He does, however, insist in the letter that these two requirements:

... are the same ones that I had conveyed orally to both Mr. Stanfield, then Leader of the Opposition, and to Mr. Flynn, during the life of the 1968-72 Parliament, some time around 1969 or 1970, I think.

Well, there are two problems here. First, the second requirement in his letter to Joe Clark differs from that set down in 1975. He talks simply of notice and makes no mention of a presubmission of names. Secondly, I remember very well that in 1970 there was but one condition and that was "retirement"—not even voluntary—probably because in the Prime Minister's mind, for life senators it did not apply. The second condition came only in 1975, and that was in the form of a presubmitted list of names, not simple notice.

As if that letter had not served to confuse matters sufficiently well, the Prime Minister held a press conference on April 21 last, at which time he said in reply to a question about Senate appointments:

You will recall that I made an offer to Mr. Stanfield when he was Leader of the Opposition in 1969 or 1970, which was then confirmed in writing, and which was also made verbally to his house leader in the Senate, Senator Flynn, followed by confirmation in writing by our then Leader in the Senate. This offer was to assure the Tories that when any of their senators retired, except if he was forced to retire by an act of God or an act of Parliament, I would be happy to replace that senator with a Tory senator. I have done that in some circumstances; that is how Senator Smith was named to the Senate.

Again, we are very grateful for that. The Prime Minister's answer continues:

You might ask the Tories why they did not take up that offer and at least ensure that their own senators when they die are all replaced by Tories, which is an offer I have made to them. When they decide to retire voluntarily, I will replace them.

What am I to make of that? It appears that on April 21, 1977, the requirements are no longer what they were between 1975 and March 18, 1977.

Senator Choquette: What if they die suddenly?

Senator Flynn: Suddenly, or otherwise, the problem is the same.

Now, we are faced again with the prerequisite of voluntary retirement. But once more the Prime Minister alluded to the replacement in cases of vacancies created by death. Possibly a slip of the tongue. We were under the impression that had been dropped in 1975.

That the retirement condition was made to me verbally in 1970, I have already admitted. But that was the only condition and unless he can show me the correspondence, I will have to inform the Prime Minister that this condition was not, as he stated in the press conference, "Confirmed in writing by our then Leader in the Senate." Senator Martin never wrote to me on this subject. I occasionally spoke to Senator Martin about it. But you will not be surprised to learn, he never committed himself on the subject.

Senator Choquette: On any subject.

Senator Flynn: The whole matter, you will have to admit, honourable senators, has been made needlessly complex by the Prime Minister.

Confusion and inconsistency have characterized the whole question. If the Prime Minister insists upon prerequisites, and I don't think he should, then let him set them straight, once and for all, and let him spell out precisely what they mean so that there will be no misunderstanding. My hope also is that from now on Senator Perrault will say the same things as the Prime Minister says, or vice versa.

This house has reached the point where the opposition, for want of members, can hardly function adequately. The two-party system operates in name only in the upper chamber. Yet, the Prime Minister has given us only two appointments since he took over the government in 1968. On the other hand, he has appointed something like 43 Grits. I do not mind; I think he has made good appointments, even if he has made eight of them during approximately the last four months. All those I have been able to meet appear to be very nice people. However, though I have not seen any of them at work, I doubt they would be superior to Senator Smith (Colchester) and Senator Asselin, the two that Prime Minister Trudeau gave us.

I think I have provided honourable senators with sufficient detail to convince them that the Prime Minister's performance in the area of Senate appointments has been confusing and inconsistent. To repeat, if he is really interested in appointing Tories to this chamber, there is nothing to stop him from doing so.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I have come to a very simple conclusion. If the Prime Minister really wants to have balanced representation of the parties in the Senate, and more particularly if he wants the official opposition to be able to play its role efficiently, not only need he not put conditions on reinforcing the ranks of the official opposition or simply, the opposition, he must not do so: when the time comes he need only exercise his traditional prerogative of consulting in advance the Leader of the Opposition, if he feels it might be helpful to do so.

You will have noticed that I put before you, objectively and very serenely, only the elements of the problems, the facts, and that without peevishness. Once again, I am not seeking the good of the Progressive Conservative Party but that of the Senate which I am eager to see function as ably as possible.

I chose to deal with the topic through an inquiry to allow the Leader of the Government, as well as all my colleagues, to express their views if they see fit. As for me, when this debate ends, I intend to abstain from discussing the subject, as long as I have not had concrete proof that the Prime Minister really intends to invite an adequate representation of the official opposition, or simply the opposition, to sit in the Senate. As far as I am concerned, it is primarily and exclusively his problem. It is up to him to act. If he does not do so, it will then be up to the tribunal of public sentiment to pass judgment on him.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think we all appreciate the remarks which have been made this evening by Senator Flynn outlining a problem which not only affects the official opposition in the Senate but the viability of the Senate itself. As it is my intention to reply to the honourable senator's statement, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 4, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

NON-RESTRICTED USE OF CYCLAMATES—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government whether the government concurs in the view that the substances known as cyclamates should not have been restricted in their use by any departments of government in years gone by?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it may be helpful to have a statement given to the chamber in that regard. I do not possess sufficient scientific knowledge to offer an opinion that would be worth very much. However, I shall endeavour to have a statement prepared which will provide the government's position on this matter.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the Honourable Leader of the Government. I would not presume to ask him whether his assessment of his opinion in that respect would be the same as in other matters.

Senator Perrault: I appreciate your counsel in this regard, Senator Smith.

Senator Flynn: It is a question.

Senator Perrault: And your ideas will be given careful consideration.

NATIONAL UNITY

PROPOSED DEBATE—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he proposes that this chamber have a debate on national unity at the same time as the House of Commons might have such a debate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is anticipated that there may be such a debate in this chamber. Whether it is to be coincident with the debate in the other place is now under consideration.

Senator Flynn: As the role of this house is one of sober second thought, does the leader not think it would be preferable for us to follow so that we might be able to correct some of the exaggerations, errors, or omissions of the other place?

[Translation]

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Leader of the Government.

[English]

As Chairman of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multi-Culturalism, I think one of the most compelling objectives we have is national unity. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he would be a little more specific as to when this chamber might debate this most important subject.

Senator Perrault: By way of reply I can say only that there have been numerous meetings and consultations involving members of this chamber and the other place, and the Leader of the Government in this house, to discuss the entire question of national unity and how senators and members of the other place may participate effectively in attempting to foster national unity and in determining the views of Canadians on this subject.

A number of senators support the idea of having a special Senate committee on this subject or on regional aspirations. Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition, as I stated the other day, has been most helpful in providing his counsel and guidance in that regard. Another view has been expressed that a joint committee of the two houses would be an effective way of proceeding with a study of national unity and related questions.

Discussions are being held at the present time, and I hope that within a few days it will be possible to make a statement on the subject in this chamber. Indeed, a resolution may come before this chamber, or a joint resolution before both chambers, with respect to action that may be taken.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: May I ask a question which is supplementary to the question which has just been asked by my honourable friend.

Is the Leader of the Government aware of the fact that in 1970-71 a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons examined the possible changes on the constitutional level and that this committee travelled across Canada for nearly a year? As I have just said, this committee included senators and House of Commons representatives. It reported to the House of Commons and made interesting constitutional proposals. I wonder why the Government of Canada did not examine this extremely important report itself or have it considered by the House of Commons and the Senate, and why it was left on the shelf while we must come back to the same formula today and have a committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons do this job. Then the job was done in 1971 and the report was tabled in 1972 and left on the shelf, and the government of Canada did not take it into consideration at all.

[English]

Senator Perrault: I am aware that this committee met, and a distinguished committee it was, made up of representatives of all political parties. Indeed, the Honourable Senator Molgat made a distinguished contribution as chairman of that committee, as I recall, for most of its life.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: The report and views of that committee are being studied very seriously in the context of present events. However, I think that the terms of reference of a proposed Senate committee, or a proposed joint committee of the two houses, would be somewhat different from the terms of reference of that previous committee, which directed its efforts towards a discussion of major constitutional changes.

Senator Asselin: This new committee would be dealing with the same matter.

Senator Perrault: At the present time I am not able to divulge to the chamber what possible new terms of reference for the committee are involved, but I do not believe that the intention would be to duplicate the excellent and distinguished work done by that previous committee.

Senator Manning: When the Leader of the Government is considering this matter, would he give special thought to the wisdom of having a very broad debate on the subject in this chamber before anything in the way of terms of reference, or even a course of procedure, such as a committee of this house or a joint committee, is decided upon? I think there is wisdom in that course, because once terms of reference are set or a committee is appointed it to some extent circumscribes the broad scope of the subject that is of concern to all of us. It seems to me that it would be helpful to the government and to this chamber if the initial step were a general discussion in this house, in which honourable senators could express their considered viewpoints on courses of action that might be helpful, prior to any terms of reference being agreed upon for a course of specific and detailed study at a later date.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has advanced a very relevant idea. Clearly a major debate of this kind is in order, whether it is held in connection with a resolution that may come before the Senate or whether another setting can be evolved for such a debate. In any case, unquestionably it is important to have the kind of wide-ranging debate suggested by the honourable senator.

That, I believe, is the consensus of honourable senators, regardless of party affiliation here. I think we all wish to be certain that the terms of reference developed for such a committee, either a Senate committee or a joint committee, will usefully serve the nation at this particular time in its history.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Pursuing the same line of thought, honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government this question. If by any chance Senator Manning's suggestion is not accepted—I sincerely hope it will be—will there be an opportunity for at least a broad range of discussion? All Canadians are concerned with this matter, not merely those who happen to sit on one side or other of the Speaker's chair.

Senator Perrault: I agree with the honourable senator. I appreciate the expression of his viewpoint, he having served as leader of a provincial government, and Senator Manning having done the same in the great province of Alberta. I would be prepared to sit down this week with the Leader of the Opposition and discuss the possibility of scheduling such a debate and its format, because it involves us all, regardless of our affiliation. I would be prepared to do that.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): Honourable senators, if I may be permitted to express my opinion with respect to this subject, it is, very simply, that we should mind our own business. What is happening in the province of Quebec concerns only the people of the province of Quebec.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): They will decide upon their fate, and I do not wonder about the manner in which they will decide; they will be on the level. The vast majority of people in Quebec are not in favour of separatism. If we ever have a real problem of separatism in Canada, it will not come from Quebec. Take my word; we will be on the level. Let us take care of our own affairs; let us mind our own business and carry on with the business of the country. That is all we have to do.

Senator Flynn: The debate has not started yet, I suggest.

Senator Perrault: In any case, there may be some merit in honourable senators from various regions of Canada expressing their views with respect to national unity, which does not relate only to the relations of any one province with Confederation. All regions of Canada have their own aspirations and problems. As I have said, the question of a debate is one which I would quite willingly discuss with the Leader of the Opposition.

PENSION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 27, the debate on the motion of Senator Carter for the second reading of Bill C-11, to amend the Pension Act.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the sponsor of Bill C-11 stated that it simply amends one section of the Pension Act. This is the disappointing aspect of this bill—it makes very minor amendments to the Pension Act. The operation and effectiveness of the Canadian Pension Commission and veterans' legislation need a complete and thorough review.

In the background material which Senator Carter was kind enough to provide he mentioned the "benefit of the doubt" clause. After 60 years, the "benefit of the doubt" clause is as vague and as meaningless as a Liberal campaign promise. In fact, it is very similar to a Liberal campaign promise, in that it is brought out every four or five years, dusted off, then put back in the archives. The principle of the benefit of the doubt is well established in our courts. An accused person is assured of the benefit of the doubt by the judge. Surely an applicant for a veteran's pension is entitled to the same protection as an accused before the courts.

Later on I shall present figures to illustrate why I feel that the Canadian Pension Commission is not extending the benefits of the act. If the Pension Commission functioned as intended by Parliament, we would not need the Pension Review Board. The idea that the Pension Commission can delay a final decision and ignore the benefit of the doubt by saying there is always one avenue left open—the Pension Review Board—is erroneous.

Last year approximately 1,000 veterans applied for disability pension. The Canadian Pension Commission has a backlog of 3,000 cases waiting to be heard. There is at least one year's wait before a veteran's case can be heard. The case of a welfare applicant receives immediate attention, yet a veteran must wait a year, and then 90 per cent of the applications must go through a second stage, namely, the Entitlement Board of the Pension Review Board.

I am sure many honourable senators have supported applications to the Canadian Pension Commission. I recall one case that was considered for seven and a half years before a favourable decision was given. Veterans are dying at the rate of approximately 22,000 per year. Since the last major revision of the Pension Act in 1971, 100,000 veterans have died, yet the number of appeals to the Pension Review Board is increasing. There were 476 appeals in 1973, and 1,200 in 1976. We must ask ourselves, honourable senators, if the system is working.

One of the reasons for the increased number of appeals is the adversary system practised by the Pension Commission. The Treasury Board and the Department of Labour are attempting to remove the adversary principle in labour relations. I suggest they should begin in the Canadian Pension Commission.

The present attitude adopted by the Pension Commission must be altered and corrected, and there is only one way to do that—there must be new personnel on the Canadian Pension Commission. The attitude of the present members is so firmly entrenched that they are like the leopard and cannot change their spots. I have often said it would be easier to get a religious dogma changed than to get a change of heart in the Pension Commission.

The most entrenched group in the Pension Commission are the medical officers. There are 22 medical officers at headquarters, and 24 medical officers in the various regional offices. An applicant for a disability pension is examined by the medical officer in his regional office, and the file then comes to Ottawa where it is reviewed by a medical officer who, despite the fact that he has not seen the patient, makes the final recommendation. He can either agree or disagree entirely with the regional medical officer who saw the patient, or he may reduce the recommendation of the regional medical officer.

While the regional medical officer in Regina, for example, may make a recommendation for an 80 per cent disability pension, the medical officer at headquarters has the authority to reduce it to the national average, and often does. He may reduce it by 40 per cent to bring it in line with the national average. To my mind, it is entirely wrong to have that authority residing with the medical officer at headquarters. The recommendation which should be considered by the Pension Commission is that of the regional medical officer who examined the veteran.

The commissioners should be freed from unnecessary detail, such as reviewing the disposition of unpaid pensions, so as to allow them more time to adequately study applications. In the event of the death of a pension recipient, the matter is reviewed to determine whether or not the pension cheque payable for the month in which the veteran died was earned. I am familiar with the case of a veteran living in northern Ontario who was the recipient of a monthly pension of $128. The only surviving member of that veteran's family was a daughter who lived in Toronto. On the day following that veteran's death, the pension cheque arrived and, on the advice of her lawyer, the daughter deposited the cheque to the credit of the veteran's bank account. Approximately four months later she was notified by the bank that the Pension Commission had stopped payment on the cheque, and that she owed the bank $128. The commission subsequently sent three, possibly four, people to interview the daughter to determine what had been spent in the month in which the veteran died. I am sure the commission spent the equivalent of a year's pension reviewing that one payment. About 18 months following the veteran's death, the final payment was cleared.

The number of applications received for disability pensions last year totalled 1,011, of which 653 were denied; 128, or 10 per cent, were approved; and 212, or 20 per cent, were partially approved.

The evidence presented to the committee of the other place on Bill C-11 indicated that one-third of the applications were granted by the Pension Commission, one-third by the Entitlement Board, and 30 per cent by the Pension Review Board. To say that 30 per cent of the applications were granted by the Canadian Pension Commission is misleading. In fact, the number of pensions granted, being 128 out of 1,011, represented only 10 per cent; 20 per cent of the applications resulted in partial pensions only.

No figures are available in respect of the percentage of disability allowed for pension purposes in those cases where the decisions were partially in favour of the applicants, but statistics are available in respect of the various categories of pension granted to veterans. As honourable senators are aware, there are 20 different categories. The four bottom categories represent 62 per cent of the pensions granted. In the case of World War II veterans, category 20, which is the lowest, represents approximately 16 per cent of the disability pensions granted; category 19 represents 23.2 per cent; category ry 18, 10 per cent; and category 17, 12.4 per cent. It is interesting to note that the pensions granted to members of the regular forces are almost identical to those granted to veterans who served in wartime.

Any discussion of veterans legislation would not be complete without mentioning the so-called 48 per cent clause. Eighty-five per cent of our pensioners received less than a 48 per cent benefit, and the result has been that 85 per cent of veterans' pensions cease with the death of the veteran. The survivors who cared for them, and who suffered many of the hardships that they did in their lifetime, have their pensions cut off. I know of no other group of federal pensioners who are treated in the same way.

I ask: Is our veterans legislation really the best in the world if only 10 per cent of those widows who were most helpful to the veteran are considered after his death? I do not think it is, and I feel this is a matter that has to be corrected, and corrected as soon as possible.

Senator Carter suggested there is no particular need for this bill to go to committee. I agree, if we are only going to consider the appointment of a deputy chairman and two ad hoc members, and the increase in tenure from five years to 10 years. In fact the tenor of this bill really does nothing more than entrench the resident Liberals, as I like to term many members of the Pension Commission and the Pension Review Board.

Honourable senators, I was rather annoyed to see a Canadian Press article headed: "Passing of Bill C-11 provides a better break for the veterans." I fail to see a break for any veteran, except possibly the individual who will be appointed deputy chairman. I shall look forward in the next 10 years to hearing of a veteran who has received any benefit from Bill C-11.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I just add one word to substantiate what Senator Phillips has been saying? I wish that the pensions and allowances payable to veterans were treated in the same way as those paid under the old age security legislation. As you know, if a person who is receiving old age pension dies, then the pension for the whole of the month in which he dies is payable to someone—either his heir or someone who has been taking care of him. This is not the case with respect to veterans' pensions and allowances. They cease on the day the veteran dies, and to get the remainder of the pension or allowance for that month—and in some extraordinary circumstances this is possible—it is necessary to fill out a large form in duplicate or triplicate, and the person so applying has to show that he or she is poverty stricken before the appropriate amount for the balance of the month is paid.

In mentioning this, honourable senators, I should like to suggest that consideration should be given to paying veterans' pensions and allowances in exactly the same way as old age pensions are paid.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Carter speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Carter, in closing this debate, would devote his attention particularly to the manner in which, and the extent to which, this bill is going to benefit the veteran who might be eligible to receive a pension.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Phillips, Senator Macdonald and Senator Smith (Colchester) for their fine interventions in this debate. Senator Phillips raised some valid points, with which I am very much in agreement. However, before replying to Senator Phillips' remarks, perhaps I should deal with the question posed by Senator Smith in which, if I understood him correctly, he asked what benefit Bill C-11 will grant to veterans.

By itself Bill C-11 will not grant any specific benefits to veterans, because it is a bill that has to do with procedure and not with the allocation of benefits per se. The benefit that veterans will derive from Bill C-11, I hope, will be in respect of something mentioned by Senator Phillips. It will lessen the delay that a veteran has to endure now, while waiting for his pension, from the time he submits his application until a final decision is handed down.

Senator Phillips stated that the Pension Commission needs a thorough review, but I would point out to honourable senators that this thorough review was made, as I said in my introduction of the bill, a few years ago. Perhaps the system is not working as well as we had hoped—and certainly it is not working as well as I personally had hoped—because our great desire at that time was that the new machinery would lessen the time that veterans had to wait for their pensions. That has not materialized to any great extent, but I do not know what changes can be made to overcome this difficulty, because the machinery we have now in the Pension Act, which consists of the Pension Commission itself, the Entitlement Board, and finally the Pension Review Board, is the very machinery requested by the veterans themselves. It was fully endorsed by the veterans, and all the veterans' organizations, so any failure that we have is more or less due to the human element in the machinery, rather than to the machinery itself.

Like Senator Phillips, I deplore the long wait—sometimes a year, sometimes more than a year—that veterans have to experience in getting their pensions, but I would ask him, if Canadian mainland veterans have a grievance in this respect, to consider how much greater the grievance is that the veterans in my province have. The veterans in Newfoundland first have to make their application to the British authorities in London, and then wait a year or more before the British authorities hand down a decision, before they can apply to the Canadian Pension Commission. Although the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada expressly state that a Newfoundland veteran is to be treated as though he had served in the Canadian forces, as far as the pension machinery is concerned he is treated very differently. Instead of having to wait one year, he very often has to wait two or more years. I understand very well how Senator Phillips feels about it, and I can tell him that I feel a lot worse.

Senator Phillips referred to the small number of pensioners who are successful on their first application. He said that there were 1,000 pension applications last year, and only 128 were given favourable consideration. That is a small proportion, but I think that we must keep in perspective the fact that the 1,000 cases that were dealt with last year were those of veterans who served 35, 40 or, in some cases, 50 years ago, and who have only now begun to apply for pension. It is very difficult at this late date to find conclusive proof that the disability the veteran now claims pension for is related to his war service. The Pension Act expressly says that entitlement can only be granted if the disability is related to, or aggravated by, his military service, or is a direct result of a disability for which he is already pensioned. That embraces most of the cases dealt with last year. I think that explains why there was such a small number of successful applicants.

Then I must point out to honourable senators that, while there were 128 successful applicants last year, of those of the remainder who appealed to the Entitlement Board about one-third were successful. The Entitlement Board is performing a very useful service. Of those rejected by the Entitlement Board and who appealed to the final authority, the Pension Review Board, again one-third were successful.

When you take into consideration the time that has elapsed since the veteran served and the amount of documentation—and possibly no documentation in many cases; not even a complaint for a number of years about the disability—it is very difficult to establish that link. Personally, I do not think the medical officers can be greatly faulted on that score. Like Senator Phillips, I would like every veteran to be a successful applicant and get his pension but, to be fair, I must point out the key difficulty of providing the evidence that will link the veteran's disability, for which he is claiming a pension, to his actual military service that took place 30 or 40 years ago, when very often there is no supporting medical evidence in the file of the veteran. That is why I think that overhauling the machinery would not accomplish much improvement, and changing the medical officers would not produce the results we want. The new medical officers would still have to come to grips with this problem, and it all boils down to human judgment.

I agree with what Senator Phillips and Senator Macdonald said about the cessation of a pension when a veteran passes away. I, too, would like to see effect given to Senator Macdonald's recommendation of at least a month's extension to the widow. I would also like to see the pension put on a proportionate basis. At the present time, if a veteran's disability is assessed at 48 per cent, his pension is paid at the nearest 5 per cent, which in this case is 50 per cent. If his disability is assessed at 47 per cent, then he receives a 45 per cent pension, and his widow loses out. The widow of a veteran receiving a 48 per cent pension receives a pension as a matter of right. The widow of a pensioner receiving a 47 per cent pension does not receive a pension as a matter of right; the pension dies with the veteran.

Again, to be fair, it must be pointed out that this does not necessarily mean the widow of a veteran who had a 47 per cent pension does not receive a pension. The difference is that she does not receive it automatically and as a matter of right. She has to apply to the Pension Commission and her case is decided on its merits. In making the decision, I think the Pension Commission does take into account the financial circumstances in which the widow is placed. A wealthy widow of a veteran who had a 47 per cent pension would likely not be granted a pension by the Pension Commission, but the widow of a veteran who had a 48 per cent pension would receive a pension regardless of her financial circumstances. The widow of a veteran who had a 47 per cent pension, who is not successful in her application to the Pension Commission, is, of course, eligible to apply to the War Veterans Allowance Board and, instead of a widow's pension, she may get a widow's allowance, based on a means test.

It is my contention that the Veterans' Charter—and I am not talking about the Pension Act itself, but about the whole body of legislation included in the Veterans' Charter—is the best in the world. I still think that contention is justified.

I am not quite clear as to whether or not Senator Phillips wants this bill to go to committee. I think a case could be made for its reference to committee. It was so referred by the other place, although there was not much discussion of it in committee. My view is that it could be maintained that there is a relationship between the Pension Review Board mentioned in section 75 and the other provisions of the act because the number of cases that come before the Pension Review Board depends on the number of cases that come before the Pension Commission and the manner in which they are disposed of. A case can also be made that section 75 in itself deals only with the Pension Review Board, but if Senator Phillips or any honourable senator wishes to pursue a broader examination, I shall be only too happy to move the necessary motion.

Senator Phillips: Based on the interpretation that Senator Carter has just given us, which is the interpretation I wanted to hear, I should like to see the bill go to committee.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Carter would be kind enough to allow me to ask him one or two questions about the bill.

Senator Carter: I shall be glad to answer any questions I can.

Senator Smith (Colchester): My first question is: For what reason is it contended that the extension of the terms of the chairman, the deputy chairman and the other members of the Pension Review Board from five to ten years will help the veteran, or anyone except the ladies or gentlemen concerned?

Senator Carter: I think that should be obvious. As I pointed out in my introduction of the bill, and again when I concluded the debate, the bill was overhauled only a few years ago, at which time a new body, the Pension Review Board, was created. It had never existed before. The tenure of the members of that Board was set at five years, more or less by way of experiment. We have now had four or five years' experience with it, and we find that it would result in more continuity if there were a longer term of office, and if two extra members were appointed to the Pension Review Board so that it could divide itself into committees in order to deal with these matters more expeditiously.

As I pointed out to Senator Phillips, there is no direct benefit to the veterans in extending the term of office of the members of the Pension Review Board, except that we hope doing so will shorten the time the veteran will have to wait for a decision on his pension.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the honourable senator for his endeavour to enlighten me. I am sorry, but I have not been able to see that light in the fullness with which he hoped I would. I do not find the idea of continuity necessarily good, unless what has been happening in the past has been good. What I am really asking is: What guarantee is there, or what reason is there for us to believe that what has been happening in the past has been good enough for us to continue the tenure of these persons, rather than seek new persons in order to bring new ideas and new concepts to the offices.

Senator Carter: The answer to that is that it takes a member of the Board at least two years to become familiar with the act and the precedents, and to acquire the experience that enables him to serve on the Board efficiently. If he has only three years left after that, then his expertise is lost. If, on the other hand, his tenure is extended to ten years, then not only do we retain the expertise, but we have the further benefit of the continued build-up of experience over that tenure.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Would the honourable senator not agree that that depends entirely on whether the lessons learned are sufficiently good; and would he not agree that it might be of salutary benefit to dispense with the services of people whose work is unsatisfactory?

Senator Carter: I am not Solomon. I do not know what the honourable senator means by "good". Is a decision good when it is in accord with his own opinion, and bad when it is not? If that is what he means, that is a poor basis for judging whether a decision is good or bad.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I compliment the honourable senator on his ingenuity. However, I should like to ask him whether the difficulty of correlating medical reports of service, which took place some 40 years ago, with present disability is not something which deserves the careful consideration of the legislature and the Pension Commission. Surely that argument ought not to be put forward as an excuse for failing to do justice to a veteran who, because of his own courage and determination to get along on his own in the past, has not devoted sufficient attention to creating records for future use.

Senator Carter: That is a common complaint and it does have some validity. Veterans, like the rest of us, are human, and some of them swing the lead and still build up their records. Every time they have a toothache they run to the M.O. and get some documentation for it, and thus build up a voluminous record. On the other hand, another veteran may not take any action at all and, therefore, does not build up any record, and, finally, when it comes time to apply for a pension he finds himself handicapped because he has no documentation. That is a fact of life, but I do not see how anyone can remedy it. We are referring to something which happened 40 or 50 years ago.

If a veteran was in A-1 condition when he was admitted into any of the services, but upon his discharge was not in that same condition, then I would take the stand that the difference must be concluded to be the result of his military service and he should be eligible at that point. However, that is not written into the act, and the Pension Commission is bound by what is in the act. Perhaps what you are really asking for is a change in the philosophy of the Pension Act itself.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Would it not be reasonable to ask the honourable senator, when we are asked to amend the act by extending the tenure of the members of the Pension Review Board, to consider the philosophy and what might benefit those who are deserving of our careful consideration?

Senator Carter: I do not think I can add much to what I have already said. I do not determine the policy. If you want to examine the policy, the proper place to do so is in committee.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Well, the honourable gentleman is asking us to approve on second reading the principle of the bill. Surely, the principle of the bill concerns policy. However, if the honourable gentleman confesses his inadequacy to deal with the matter, I accept that.

Senator Walker: No offence!

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I ask a question? Did I correctly hear the sponsor of the bill say that it takes two years for a member of the Pension Review Board to familiarize himself with the act and the precedents? Did I hear that correctly?

Senator Carter: What I said, I said extemporaneously. I did not have notes. However, I did say that it takes at least two years for a member to familiarize himself with the act and the precedents which have been built up and with the procedures involved. There are various factors to be taken into consideration when adjudicating a veteran's pension. There is much to be learned, and it must be learned by experience. It cannot be learned from a textbook.

Senator Flynn: Until then, his decisions are rather inadequate.

Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Not at all.

Senator Flynn: Does he make decisions in the meantime?

Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Come off it!

Senator Croll: Let's get on with it.

Senator Flynn: Well, explain that, Senator Smith. Come on! Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Carter, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

COMPETITION POLICY

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY LEGISLATION

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved pursuant to notice of May 3:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and report upon the subject matter of the Bill C-42, intituled: "An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and to amend the Bank Act and other Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof," the subject matter of which was referred to the Standing Senate Committee of the House of Commons on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on Friday, 25th March, 1977, or any matter relating thereto; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, I think a few words of explanation would be in order. The reason for making this motion at this time arises because of the course of action that was taken in the other place.

On March 25 of this year, Bill C-42 was at the stage of second reading, and was on the Orders of the Day for that day. The first motion that was made by the government house leader—and I ask honourable senators to note this—was:

That the subject matter of Bill C-42, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and to amend the Bank Act and other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

It appeared from the debate that followed that this matter had been discussed with the leaders of the various parties represented in the Commons, because they all spoke favourably of this disposition of the matter. Thereupon, the question having been raised about what would happen to Bill C-42 and its position on the Order Paper, the report in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons for that day says as follows:

After debate thereon—

That is, on the motion I have read.

—the question being put on the motion, it was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Order was discharged, the Bill withdrawn and the subject-matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Following that, advertisements appeared in various newspapers indicating that this Commons committee was proposing to conduct hearings, setting a date for registration of a desire or intention to appear, and also setting a time for the filing of briefs, and then indicating that the hearings would take place, starting at the beginning of June of this year and terminating at the end of that month.

The minister made a statement in which he said that the amendments he is proposing will be submitted to this committee, that the representations that will have been heard by the committee will be translated into a report, and that with all this material a new bill will be tabled in the next session, which is expected to commence in October of this year.

Before I go on, I should like to call Senator Grosart's attention to the wording of the resolution in the Commons. I have not been able to find any other occasion upon which the subject matter of a pending piece of legislation has been referred by the Commons to one of its committees, although we have adopted this procedure here for many years.

If I may continue, it appeared to me then that we should meet actively to study the subject matter of this bill and hear representations. As a matter of fact, without any authority from the Senate, we have been receiving requests from outside interests saying that they would like to appear. Of course, we have not been able to do anything about it. It seems very important that this bill should be studied by the committee, because a year and a half ago we did deal with phase one of the competition bill, which made certain amendments to the Combines Investigation Act.

In the course of the report, which honourable senators can read, we raised certain issues, such as civil remedies and items of that kind, whereupon the then minister said, "Well, when phase two, which deals with mergers and monopolies, comes before you, you will have the opportunity to discuss and raise the same issues, such as civil remedies, et cetera. Therefore, you will have another chance. It is not as though you are foreclosing for all time your interest and your position on these issues that you have raised." On that basis, and after further discussion, we reported the bill without amendment.

These things are outstanding. This is a very important bill, and I think that on behalf of the Senate an examination should be made of the subject matter of Bill C-42, and a report made at this time. To some extent, there may be different viewpoints that will have to be resolved. In any event, the subject matter is very important. The opportunity to have hearings and an examination at this stage before a new bill is drafted is a limited one in time. Therefore, it would mean the committee would have to get to work almost at once in order to study the bill, hear evidence and prepare a report. For that reason I have brought forward this motion.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the situation described by Senator Hayden is rather unusual, because, as I understand it, Bill C-42 has been withdrawn. So, are we to consider the bill that has been withdrawn to be a white paper? We do not know in what manner it is to be replaced. However, we should be made aware of what we are to consider this bill which has been withdrawn, the government having announced that it will redraft it. It is a strange situation, to say the least.

My second point is that, apparently, the House of Commons committee will deal with this bill, even though it has been withdrawn. How do they look upon it? Do they consider it a white paper?

Senator Hayden: May I answer your first question—

Senator Flynn: I have another point, if Senator Hayden will permit me. If I am correct, the Commons committee will deal with the bill, although it has been withdrawn, and we will deal with the same subject matter at the same time. Does that mean that we will hear the same witnesses? And how will it be determined what we will do in the Senate committee as compared to what is done in the Commons committee? In my opinion, the situation is rather complex and I would like the honourable senator to attempt to shed a little light on it.

Senator Hayden: My interpretation of what has taken place is that Bill C-42 has been reduced to the status of a white paper by the action which has been taken and—

Senator Flynn: A weak white paper.

Senator Hayden: —it is ordinary procedure for us to study the subject matter of a white paper.

Senator Flynn: A fading white paper.

Senator Hayden: So, I see no reason for concern in that regard. The committee, as appears from the notes which I read from the Votes and Proceedings of March 25, does indicate that it is proceeding to deal with Bill C-42. It must be on the basis that it is in the nature of a white paper, because it is no longer on the order paper as a bill.

I notice, also, that in the course of the debate, before the vote was taken and after the Speaker had commented, "The procedure is a little extraordinary, but if it is simply to allay a concern of the hon. member perhaps the minister might answer," the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said:

Mr. Speaker, I welcome a chance to allay that particular apprehension. In the discussions I indicated we would provide a list of persons and organizations who in the past years have expressed interest, but I think the committee would probably want to issue a more general invitation.

So, obviously they are proceeding on the basis that it is a white paper. It is the only basis on which they can proceed.

Senator Flynn: It is interesting, however, that we are in an even more difficult situation than when we face a white paper. This is so because, since the minister decided to withdraw the bill, it has not been indicated that it is the intention of the minister or his department to introduce the same type of legislation. They may well have other very different ideas in mind. It seems to me that, at least, we should begin studying this bill with the minister explaining the changes he intends making when he introduces a new bill, or even a real white paper.

Senator Hayden: There may be, and undoubtedly are, points in the bill, which is now reduced to a white paper—

Senator Flynn: Even less than that, I suggest.

Senator Hayden: —that should be considered at this stage. So far as I see the point, we have in this chamber at times approved resolutions in which we have referred the subject matter of a white paper, including the authority to study any legislation proposed to implement the proposals contained in the white paper, to a committee. So in the past we have taken authority to do two things, and the situation as I see it now is a parallel to that situation, because there is no bill. Therefore, what we are looking and—

Senator Flynn: There is no white paper, either.

Senator Hayden: We are looking at something which was a bill and which has had its status changed to that of a white paper. I do not know what else we could call it.

Senator Flynn: I do not contest the possible usefulness of either study. I am just attempting to obtain a clear indication as to what the committee will do. If it considers the no-longer-existing bill a white paper, in my mind that is not sufficient. The mere withdrawal of the bill indicates that the department and the minister have new views, so we would be operating in the dark. That is why I suggest that it would not be sufficient to take the bill as some form of white paper. We would have to start with a general statement by department officials or the minister as to the direction they now intend to take with regard to the bill which will be introduced to replace Bill C-42, in order that we know where we are going. If the minister or the department have abandoned the idea of this bill, we will be operating in a no-man's land.

Senator Hayden: If you assume, as I think you do, that the present position of the matter is that C-42 is tantamount to a white paper—

Senator Flynn: Not exactly; I do not think so.

Senator Hayden: Not exactly, but give it another name.

Senator Flynn: That is what I was attempting to suggest. How would you describe it—a green paper; a red paper?

Senator Hicks: An off-white paper.

Senator Choquette: Am I correct in assuming that in the past—

Senator Hayden: May I continue answering Senator Flynn?

Senator Choquette: I am sorry.

Senator Hayden: If it is not a white paper, it is proposals for legislation—

Senator Flynn: It is a former white paper.

Senator Hayden: We are in that position at the present time with respect to the White Paper on the Revision of Canadian Banking Legislation, because there will be a bill at some stage implementing what has been proposed. So do not call it a white paper, if that offends your sense of propriety—call it “proposals”—but whatever you call it, this is the subject matter to which my motion refers. If you wish to ascertain what the subject matter is, it is to be found in Bill C-42; it is to be found in various treatises and brochures which have been issued along the way by the government in connection with this matter. Therefore, in my view, there is an element that should be studied at this time so that we are in line with the present thinking and proposals of the government. As to what other proposals and views we will have, I do not know, but at least we can prepare ourselves with respect to what we know.

Senator Choquette: Am I wrong in assuming that when we referred the subject matter of a bill to committee it was tantamount to giving it the six months' hoist and in effect, killing it? That has been my experience during the few years I have been here.

● (1520)

Senator Hayden: I would say there is no danger of killing the bill.

Senator Flynn: You cannot kill something which is dead.

Senator Hayden: The bill has been withdrawn. The bill, as a bill in the course of its procedure through Parliament, has disappeared. It has been withdrawn from the order paper. Therefore it is in the position of possible pending bills, and there may be a number of them. So far as shutting off any discussion on this subject matter, a new bill can be introduced at a later date. Nothing the Senate does will impede or hold up consideration of the bills concerned, or the submission of a new bill if the government decides to introduce one. We will draw certain conclusions and make a report. Those conclusions will be acceptable, or they will not. We will report to the Senate, and the Senate will follow a course of action.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, obviously there is no bill before the house and obviously there is not at the present time a white paper. But I agree with my honourable friend that there is no reason whatever why this motion should not pass so that we can consider the subject matter of the former bill. Is not that correct? If so, I agree with the honourable senator's submission.

Senator Flynn: In any event, my questions can very well be put in committee when it commences its study. I was concerned as to exactly how we would operate. However, I think I can do that more efficiently in committee when the committee meets to determine its method of operation.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, as to how the committee will operate, all I can say is that I am only the chairman. The Leader of the Opposition is a member of the committee, as is Senator Walker, Senator Beaubien and Senator Haig. All members of the committee will have to settle on the procedure to be followed. As I mentioned, there have already been inquiries from people who would like to be heard in relation to the subject matter of Bill C-42.

Senator Flynn: I wish to say that I have never heard a greater understatement than that Senator Hayden is only the chairman of the committee.

Senator Deschatelets: Could Senator Hayden advise whether the committee in the other place has completed its examination of this subject matter?

Senator Hayden: No. Bill C-42 was at the stage on the order paper where it was up for second reading and reference to a committee. It was not referred to committee. It was not proceeded with on second reading. There was a motion by the government house leader in the Commons referring the subject matter of the bill to a Commons standing committee. That was passed, and the government house leader in the Commons then made a motion that the bill be withdrawn from the order paper. They had to tidy up the order paper. They did not want to leave it sitting there at the stage of standing for second reading. I believe the matter was raised by Mr. Knowles who pointed out the difficulty of leaving on the order paper an item which could not be proceeded with because the subject matter had been referred to committee. The motion was then put that the bill be withdrawn from the order paper. Therefore, they have cleaned up their order paper.

Senator Deschatelets: Then the committee has not yet met?

Senator Hayden: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

NOTICE OF MEETINGS

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before I move adjournment of the Senate, I should like to remind honourable senators that two committees will meet after the house rises. The Committee on Standing Rules and Orders will meet in room 263-S, and the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet in room 256-S to examine the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 5, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

JAMES BAY AND NORTHERN QUEBEC NATIVE CLAIMS SETTLEMENT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-9, to approve, give effect to and declare valid certain agreements between the Grand Council of the Crees (of Quebec), the Northern Quebec Inuit Association, the Government of Quebec, la Société d'énergie de la Baie James, la Société de développement de la Baie James, la Commission hydro-électrique de Québec and the Government of Canada and certain other related agreements to which the Government of Canada is a party.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Report of the Anti-Inflation Board, dated April 21, 1977, to the Governor General in Council, pursuant to section 17(2) of the Anti-Inflation Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, reporting its reference to the Administrator of the said Act of proposed changes in compensation plan between the Otis Elevator Company Limited and their Plant Hourly Employees, represented by the United Steelworkers of America, local 7062.

Copies of Report on the operations of the Office of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act covering the period from 31 December 1975 to 31 March 1977, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76.

Report of Eldorado Nuclear Limited and its subsidiary, Eldorado Aviation Limited, including their accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1976, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT APPROVING SALARY REVISIONS TABLED

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table a schedule of authorized salary revisions for certain Senate positions, effective April 1, 1977, as approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, at its meeting of Thursday, May 5, 1977.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE BUDGETS TABLED

Senator Laird, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled reports approving budgets of the following committees:

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

The Special Senate Committee on Science Policy.

(For texts of reports, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator McDonald, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-2, to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McDonald moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 10, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put I should like, as usual, to give a brief summary of the work of the Senate for the coming week. Dealing first with committee meetings, on Tuesday next the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet at 2.30 p.m. to hear witnesses with respect to its inquiry into relations between Canada and the United States, and at 3.30 p.m. the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science will meet to consider Bill C-11, an act to amend the Pension Act.

On Wednesday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet in camera at 9.30 a.m. to consider the White Paper on Canadian Banking Legislation.

On Thursday the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet at 9.30 a.m. to continue its study of Canada-United States relations; the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet at 9.30 a.m., and at 3.30 p.m. or when the Senate rises, to hear witnesses in connection with its inquiry into the beef industry; and at 3.30 p.m. there will be a meeting of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

The Senate will proceed with second reading of Bill C-9, which came to us today from the Commons, and the other items now on the order paper.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

CROWN CORPORATIONS NOT SUBJECT TO AUDIT—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Would he inform the Senate of the names of those crown corporations which, under the Financial Administration Act, are not subject to audit by the Auditor General of Canada? Of course, I do not expect that information today.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall be pleased to take that question as notice, and attempt to provide the information at the earliest opportunity.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps you could add the reasons for their not being subject to it.

PRAIRIE PROVINCES

DROUGHT CONDITIONS

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, this week Senator Austin asked a question about drought conditions prevalent in the prairie provinces. This led to some comments and I quote Senator Smith (Colchester), who said:

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if the only policy of the government in this very serious crisis is to pray for rain.

A little later he asked:

Does the Leader of the Government not know that it is only the prayers of the righteous that avail?

I am pleased to report, after communication with Saskatchewan this morning, that a most delightful rain is falling now—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: —on those parched prairies. It is a really marvellous rain all across the province. My question, I suppose, is now directed to Senator Smith—

Senator Flynn: On a point of order. You cannot put a question to a member of the house other than the Leader of the Government. You can, however, put a question to yourself and reply; and that you have done.

Senator Buckwold: Then I will point out that the prayers which have been referred to have been answered, and, therefore, by Senator Smith's definition, the leader and the government he represents must be considered to be righteous and deserving, and—to paraphrase Senator Walker—faith must have been accompanied by good works.

Senator Langlois: Saskatchewan is close to God.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I intend to ask a question on another subject, but before doing so I should like to acknowledge the logic of the honourable senator's comment, but also to say that if the rain fell only upon Saskatchewan the prayers have as yet only been half answered. Therefore, I suppose at the moment all one can claim is that the prayerful attitude has been only half useful, and we look forward either to more righteousness or a better policy.

An Hon. Senator: More prayers.

Senator Smith (Colchester): More useful prayers. I can add that perhaps there were other prayers, which more readily conform to the definition of prayers of the righteous, which were answered.

Senator Perrault: In connection with Senator Buckwold's earlier remarks, I should like to add that it is gratifying that the prayers and supplications of honourable senators have been answered so swiftly. It suggests that this chamber has some very good connections in the universe, which makes me think we should pursue that line of communication more frequently.

Senator Walker: May I interject to add that so far the rain has fallen only on Tory Saskatchewan and Tory Alberta.

Senator Perrault: I must say that a cabinet minister from Winnipeg reported today to his colleagues that there are two inches of water in his basement. Surely this constitutes an embarrassment of riches.

FISHERIES

VIOLATIONS OF COASTAL JURISDICTION—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, with reference to the extension of Canada's offshore jurisdiction to 200 miles, I should like to inquire of the Leader of the Government whether any foreign ships have been found fishing within that limit without proper authority and, if so, where, when, what ships, what nationality, and what action has been taken in relation to each.

Senator Perrault: Because of the details which have been requested, I should like to take the question as notice.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SALARY OF FORMER CBC EMPLOYEE—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I rise to inform the Senate of a reply I have received from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to a question posed by Senator Riley, the question being whether it is true that a present member of the Péquiste government in Quebec was earning more money than the President of the CBC when she was an employee of the CBC and an avowed separatist.

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

It has not been customary to require the CBC to disclose such details of its internal management and administration as the amounts paid to performers as fees. The background of this custom is described in detail in the reply to the question asked of the CBC on December 16, 1976 by the Honourable Senator Norrie.

I regret, honourable senators, that I am unable to be more helpful at this time. It may be that the management of the CBC should be questioned more closely with respect to this policy when they next appear before a Senate committee.

Senator Flynn: Had the reply been a simple yes it would not have divulged anything.

ACCOUNTABILITY TO PARLIAMENT

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government, in light of the reply just given, whether he is satisfied that that is a proper way for the CBC to account to the representatives of the public, namely, Parliament, in respect of the expenditure of public funds?

Senator Perrault: I think there should be a better system of accountability. I think it is in the public interest to have additional details with respect to the operations of any corporation spending large amounts of public money. Without suggesting in any way that there be any unfair restriction on the freedom of this public corporation, I think Parliament should ask to be provided with more detail with respect to its operations. Perhaps that is a subject we should take up with CBC's management when they next appear before one of our committees.

Senator Flynn: In any event, we are saving money now.

BANK ACT

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the second reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-39 would amend section 6 of the Bank Act and of the Quebec Savings Banks Act in order to permit the banks chartered under those acts to carry on business until March 31, 1978. As these acts now read, the powers of the banks to do business would lapse on July 1, 1977. Without this action by Parliament, the banks would not have legislative authority to carry on operations after that date.

This bill is necessary because it is now evident that it is not possible to introduce and have passed by Parliament before July 1 of this year the government's proposals for the decennial revision of the Bank Act and related legislation. It is obvious that the development and the drafting of this legislation is taking longer than was originally envisaged.

The extension of the Bank Act has precedents. In the first half of this century, the act was extended three times, in 1911, 1912 and 1933, and in the period from June 1964 to July 1967 it was extended five times. The delay at that latter time was due, in part, to the time it took to receive the Report of the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance and to give the public and the government time to digest its recommendations.

On this occasion, the decennial revision process is taking longer than was originally envisaged, for three reasons. The first is the extent of consultations encouraged by the issuance of a white paper; the second is the size and complexity of the task; and the third is the extent of other pressures on the small group of legislative draftsmen in the Department of Justice.

As long ago as September 1974, the then Minister of Finance invited submissions on the decennial revision. These submissions, which were asked for by the fall of 1975, came in through that autumn and the winter of 1975-76. As you may recall, the Minister of Finance issued a white paper in August 1976, setting out the government's major proposals for change in our banking legislation, to enable interested parties to discuss these proposals before the legislation was prepared.

Briefs were again encouraged, to be received by October 15, 1976. In fact, the minister continued to receive briefs after that date because of the importance of the issues at stake and the desire to take full advantage of the views and experience of Canadians wishing to be heard. Throughout this whole period, government representatives have had a number of meetings with those seeking direct discussion, including the provincial governments, representatives of the credit unions, caisses populaires, trust companies, loan companies and finance companies, investment dealers, the banks themselves—including foreign banks—and others. While this process has been time-consuming, it has been very worthwhile. As honourable senators know, this process of consultation has continued in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Those of you who have read the white paper, the published submissions that have been sent to the minister and to the Senate, and the record of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee hearings, will understand the extent and complexity of this decennial revision. Any restructuring of the legal framework within which our major financial institutions operate is a serious business, and a process that cannot be hurried unduly. There will be ample time, after the introduction of the government's detailed proposals, to discuss their substance.

At this time I would simply stress the extent and complexity of the task the government faces in preparing this legislation. A substantial part of the drafting task is the restructuring of the Bank Act to incorporate in it, insofar as possible, the relevant parts of the Canada Business Corporations Act. This is a large task. It is further complicated by the fact that the French version of the Canada Business Corporations Act, by virtue of a discussion in a committee of the other place, is currently under revision, and the final version will impact heavily on the French version of the banking legislation.

Finally, because of the complex and specialized nature of some of the proposed banking legislation, and the fact that this legislation is only amended every decade, there are few people in the Department of Justice who have the experience to undertake this drafting. They have over the past several months been hard pressed by a heavy load of important legislation, and have not been able to give the Bank Act the time and attention that would have been required to bring the proposed amendments forward at this time.

This bill will extend the decennial period by nine months. The government's intention in introducing it is to help ensure that Parliament will have ample time, after its introduction, to give the amending legislation the time and attention it deserves.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 10, at 8 p.m.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CONCENTRATION OF CORPORATE POWER

RESIGNATION OF CHAIRMAN—QUESTION

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, having learned with profound personal sorrow of the illness of Mr. Robert Bryce, a long-time outstanding public servant, obliging him to resign as chairman and only full-time commissioner of the Royal Commission on Concentration of Corporate Power, may I ask the Leader of the Government this question: What steps does the government propose to take, at least in part, to rectify this deplorable situation?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and provide a reply as soon as possible.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE INQUIRY

VOLUME ONE OF REPORT—QUESTION AND ANSWER

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question regarding the Berger Commission Report which he tabled this evening. Would the government leader encourage the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to receive that report and hear submissions from people in the private sector with respect to its impact on the Canadian economy and community?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the proposal will certainly be given consideration by the government. I can say that the report is under study now by the government. As honourable senators are aware, it addresses a broad range of environmental, social and economic issues, with particular reference to the native people of the north. The report is being given careful and serious examination by the government as it weighs impending decisions with regard to northern pipelines. No decision can be taken by the government until it receives the conclusions of the National Energy Board, now expected in early July. In addition, we look forward to receiving the second volume of Mr. Justice Berger's report during the summer. However, the proposal advanced this evening to broaden the nature of parliamentary inquiry into this important matter will be considered carefully.

Senator Flynn: Would the Leader of the Government agree that if Senator Austin wishes to give notice of an inquiry he can do so?

Senator Perrault: Without doubt.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

NON-RESTRICTED USE OF CYCLAMATES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on May 4 the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester), asked "whether the government concurs in the view that the substances known as cyclamates should not have been restricted in their use by any departments of government in years gone by?"

The reply is as follows:

The government does not concur in the view that the substances known as cyclamates should not have been restricted in their use by any department of government in years gone by.

In Canada, action was taken in 1969 to restrict the use of cyclamates to tabletop sweeteners, with a requirement that the label state the product should be taken on the advice of a physician. The United States government completely banned the use of cyclamates a few days before the Canadian action was announced. Both countries acted in the interest of prudence, as a result of studies suggesting that cyclamates produced bladder cancer in experimental animals.

Since 1969, a great deal of additional information has become available on the safety of cyclamate, as a result both of significant advances in the methodology of safety testing, and intensive interest in the safety of artificial sweeteners. These recent studies have not confirmed the earlier suspicions that cyclamates are carcinogenic. However, several investigations have found that cyclamates do cause another problem: atrophy of the testicles in male rats. Studies are now under way which may permit a final assessment of the overall safety of cyclamates. In the meantime, the status of cyclamate remains unchanged, and its marketing, other than under the restricted conditions mentioned above, is not permitted.

BANK ACT QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 5, the debate on the motion of Senator Macnaughton for the second reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the sponsor of the bill, Senator Macnaughton, explained thoroughly the purpose of this bill and the results it will have. Because neither the government nor Parliament can meet the deadline of June 30 or July 1, 1977, the date on which the current act respecting banks and saving banks expires, it, or rather those two acts, must of necessity be extended further to allow the government, once again, and Parliament to introduce new legislation in this regard.

The government tabled a white paper, if I remember correctly, in 1976, about a year ago. As you know, a committee of the House of Commons, as well as a committee chaired by Senator Hayden, worked on that white paper and received briefs of all sorts. In fact, unless I am mistaken, our committee is just about to submit a report on the briefs and the work done to date.

In any event, this bill would extend the application of the existing act till March 31, 1978; that is, for an additional nine months after the date set in the act, namely, June 30, 1977.

It may be interesting to note that the wording submitted by the Minister of Finance proposed a rather complicated system. It provided for the extension of the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act as follows:

If Parliament sits on at least 20 days during the month of December 1977, the bank may carry on the business of banking until the first day of January 1978.
that is, on the whole, for six months, and if Parliament does not sit on at least 20 days during the month of December 1977, the bank may carry on the business of banking until the sixtieth sitting day of Parliament next thereafter, and no longer.

that is until, say, March 1, 1978. This was very complicated and following a suggestion made by the opposition in the House of Commons, the present wording was adopted and it simply extends both acts until March 31, 1978.

The only relevant question is whether this will be enough to enable the government to make a decision and to put forward legislation based substantially on the white paper which has already been tabled or on some considerations based on the recommendations of the committee chaired by Senator Hayden or the committee in the other place for example.

For the rest, the white paper proposes, of course, substantial amendments. There is no doubt about that and I think it would be prudent and wise to refrain from making a hasty decision in this matter. We should extend the act once again until March 31, 1978, because Parliament will probably be asked to further extend this act. That is the sole purpose of the bill before us. No other principle is involved. It does not give rise to any other difficulty and there is no objection to its passage.

JAMES BAY AND NORTHERN QUEBEC NATIVE CLAIMS SETTLEMENT BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Maurice Bourget moved the second reading of Bill C-9, to approve, give effect to and declare valid certain agreements between the Grand Council of the Crees (of Quebec), the Northern Quebec Inuit Association, the Government of Quebec, la Société d'énergie de la Baie James, la Société de développement de la Baie James, la Commission hydro-électrique de Québec and the Government of Canada and certain other related agreements to which the Government of Canada is a party.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, we have today before the Senate for consideration on second reading the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement Bill. The purpose of Bill C-9 is to approve, give effect to and declare valid the agreement between the Grand Council of the Crees (of Quebec), the Northern Quebec Inuit Association, the Government of Quebec, the Société d'énergie de la Baie James, the Société de développement de la Baie James, the Commission hydro-électrique de Québec and the Government of Canada, and certain other related agreements to which the Government of Canada is a party.

[English]

The James Bay and Northern Quebec agreement was the result of a long and what was an often difficult process of planning, discussion and negotiation between the Crees and the Inuit of northern Quebec and the federal and provincial governments. I should like to describe that process briefly, because it is a tribute to the dedication and sense of purpose of all those who have been involved in fashioning the agreement and preparing the legislation now before us.

The federal government's role and participation in events leading to the signing of this agreement concerning James Bay stems from the legislative jurisdiction with respect to Indians and lands reserved for Indians assigned to the Parliament of Canada by the British North America Act, 1867. Part of that responsibility was to provide protection to the Indian people in their traditional occupancy and use of lands. The James Bay and Northern Quebec agreement demonstrates clearly the federal government's recognition of its obligations towards the Indians and Inuit of northern Quebec. As a comprehensive claims settlement the agreement acknowledges the traditional use and occupancy of the lands by the Indians and Inuit of that territory.

Actually, both the federal and provincial governments had certain obligations with respect to the settlement of native claims in the territory. The terms of the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act of 1912, which transferred the area north of the Eastmain River from the Northwest Territories to the jurisdiction of Quebec, provided that the province would recognize native rights in that area and pay compensation for the surrender of such rights in the same manner as the Government of Canada had previously done in other areas.

[Translation]

However, the obligations under the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act remained unheeded until 1971, at which time the Dorion provincial commission recommended the signing of an agreement recognizing the rights of the native people in the area. In the spring of the same year, the Quebec government announced its intention to develop the hydroelectric resources of James Bay and created the Société de développement de la Baie James. These new developments caused the Crees to express their concern about their territorial land rights, which resulted in periodical meetings between Indian Affairs officials, Cree representatives and the provincial officials concerned.

Some time later, an environmental task force including provincial and federal representatives was established to study the ecological impact of the project, and the federal government began to provide funds to the Association des Indiens du Québec to enable it to inform the native people in the territory of the proposed development.

During those two years, the main effort was aimed at convincing the provincial government to take notice of the problems raised by the native people. Since this approach failed to produce the anticipated results, the Indians and the Inuit went to court in order to obtain an injunction and put a stop to the James Bay project, with the assistance of $5.5 million from the federal government in the form of subsidies and loans.

Negotiations finally began early in 1974 on the basis of a Quebec government offer in keeping with the suggestions made a few months before by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The federal government was satisfied with this offer because it contained the elements thought essential for a satisfactory settlement along the lines of government policy concerning native claims.

[English]

This policy, which was announced in August 1973, acknowledged the government's willingness to negotiate with the Indian and Inuit representatives on the basis of claims that related to the loss of traditional use and occupancy of lands in those areas of Canada where Indian title had never been extinguished by treaty or superseded by law. The policy recognized that these claims, which it called "comprehensive," were not only for money or land but involved the possible loss of a way of life, or required at least major adjustments, for which the native people concerned should be compensated. While it committed the federal government to a key role in any claims negotiations, the policy emphasized that settlements could only be satisfactorily reached if the province or territory concerned participated along with the federal government in the negotiation, settlement and compensation process.

In northern Quebec, the main concern of the Crees and Inuit was not to obtain monetary compensation but, rather, to preserve their traditional culture and lifestyle while at the same time gaining an effective voice in controlling matters which affect their daily lives in the territory.

The James Bay and Northern Quebec agreement, which was signed on November 11, 1975, answered the needs of the Crees and Inuit, fulfilled the federal government's commitment to seek a just settlement of their claim, and enabled Quebec to continue to meet its particular responsibilities toward the citizens of the province as a whole.

This is, perhaps, the most important aspect of the James Bay and Northern Quebec agreement—that it is designed for accommodation. It represents, in my view, an honest attempt by all signatory parties to accommodate particular needs and fulfill particular obligations in a manner satisfactory to all concerned. It is regarded by the participants as a good settlement—not a model for others, for which it is not meant, but one to be defended in terms of the mutual satisfaction and benefits it brings to those who signed it.

In signing the agreement, the Crees and Inuit are sure that their needs will be met with respect to the usage and occupancy of lands, special hunting, fishing and trapping arrangements, health and social services, education, the administration of justice, economic development opportunities, protection of the environment, and local and regional autonomy. The agreement will result in greater control by the native people of their own affairs, and increased native participation in all aspects of the administration of the Territory.

In the words of Billy Diamond, whom I salute tonight since he is in the gallery, Chief of the Grand Council of the Crees of Quebec, "The James Bay Crees have put themselves in an autonomous and independent position, not only to face the Governments of Canada and of Quebec, but also to face the society which they will have to participate in, not as spectators, but as participators and decision-makers of the future".

[Translation]

Monetary compensation totalling $225 million over a 20-year period will be paid to corporations controlled and managed by Crees and Inuit for the benefit of all James Bay and Northern Quebec natives. The federal government is committed to pay $32.75 million, and the provincial government will pay $42.25 million. An additional $75 million, guaranteed by the Quebec government, will be paid by the James Bay Power Corporation as royalties on hydroelectric revenues. Finally, the Quebec government will pay native peoples $75 million in the form of bonds, in lieu of Quebec's original proposal for royalties on mining revenues in the territory. The agreement also provides for tax exemption in respect of all monetary compensation.

Beyond those special rights and benefits, the agreement ensures that Crees and Inuit will continue in the rights and privileges set forth in the Indian Act in cases, of course, where it is applicable, as well as the benefits provided for in any other special statutes that may arise from the agreement. Crees and Inuit will also remain entitled to federal and provincial general programs available to Canadian and Quebec Indians and Inuit.

The Crees and Inuit in turn have agreed to forego their territorial claims and accept the continuation of James Bay hydroelectric developments, in consideration of the benefits accruing from the agreement. As for Quebec, it made some amendments to the hydroelectric development project because of native concerns. They will also take remedial action to minimize as much as possible the harm caused by the project to the native way of life. The cost of such remedial action to the James Bay Corporation alone will total some $30 million.

[English]

I have said that the agreement is designed specifically to accommodate needs and wishes in a way that will be of benefit to all parties. I think it is very important at this juncture to point out that it is also designed to permit accommodation for those native groups who were not party to it, but who may have interests in the territory. It assures them of the opportunity to obtain certain rights and benefits which otherwise they might not have.

● (2040)

Under section 2.14 of the agreement, Quebec

—undertakes to negotiate with other Indians or Inuit who are not entitled to participate in the compensation and benefits of the present agreement, in respect to any claims which such Indians or Inuit may have with respect to the Territory.

In the view of the federal government, section 2.14 protects non-signatory native groups. I stress that point because if honourable senators have read the debates of the House of Commons, or discussions that took place in the committee meetings, they will know that this clause has been raised very often. That is the reason why I stress that in the view of the federal government, section 2.14 protects non-signatory native groups who can establish valid claims to land in the territory. It constitutes a legal obligation which the province has stated it fully intends to honour.

In his inaugural address before the National Assembly on March 8, Premier Lévesque confirmed this intention by the following statement:

[Translation]

Negotiations will continue with the other Indian nations to reach in those other cases satisfactory agreements.

[English]

Quebec's participation in the negotiations with the Naskapis of Schefferville, which are now nearing completion—and today I was told that an agreement will be signed in the near future—is a concrete example of that province's willingness to negotiate, pursuant to section 2.14, with native groups not party to the agreement.

I believe that the James Bay and Northern Quebec agreement represents a major development in the relationship between governments and native people. Previous to the agreement and Bill C-9, the traditional, unspecified rights which native people had in the territory had never been clarified in Canadian law, and had never been sanctioned or protected by treaties or laws. This uncertainty and vagueness will disappear upon giving legal status, acceptable in our courts of law, to the well-defined rights and benefits contained in the agreement which will be given effect to by Bill C-9.

As an added safeguard to ensure that the rights of the Crees and Inuit in the territory are protected, the bill provides for an annual process of reporting on the implementation of the act until the end of the compensation period—that is, from 1978 to 1998. Clause 5 of the bill is an important one because it provides the members of the Senate, as well as those of the House of Commons, with the opportunity to discuss and vote on any amendment to the agreement which might be proposed in the years ahead. This process will enable the Senate to make sure that the rights of the native people who are party to this agreement will in no way be diminished as a result of such amendments.

[Translation]

I am convinced, honourable senators, that this is a good agreement because it was concluded as a result of lengthy and careful negotiations which really aimed at meeting the special needs of the Cree and Northern Quebec Inuit. In the evidence heard by the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the native people who are parties to the agreement have indicated their satisfaction as regards this agreement.

But the agreement will take effect only when the legislation is sanctioned by Parliament and provincial legislatures. Actually, last July the Quebec legislature passed a bill similar to Bill C-9, Bill 32. Until the federal legislation, that is to say Bill

C-9 which is now before us, is adopted, all the provisions of the James Bay and Northern Quebec agreements will not be fully implemented and the Cree and Inuit will not benefit fully from the advantages provided to them under this agreement.

Therefore, to conclude, honourable senators, I commend this legislation to your attention so that we can refer it to committee, which I believe will be the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. In my opinion, there is a legal aspect—I am not a lawyer—but I understand that those in the legal profession feel there is an important legal aspect in this legislation. Well, honourable senators, I wish to thank you for your kind attention and—

Senator Flynn: Federal, provincial?

Senator Bourget: Yes. Many honourable senators may have read or looked at the agreement under debate. They will realize that I have not dealt with too many aspects of the agreement because I found it a bit complicated. Under those circumstances, we should rather wait for the committee stage, where the minister or departmental experts will be present and they will be in a better position to give more enlightened answers than those which, in all humbleness, I, for one, could give tonight.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, after listening to the bright speech of my colleague, Senator Bourget, I do not feel prepared tonight to make all the comments that would be relevant to the presentation of this legislation before this chamber. Of course, there are very important aspects which have not been dealt with, as Senator Bourget said, such as legal aspects which will have to be scrutinized and considered in light of evidence brought by knowledgeable experts in constitutional law. Therefore, if no other senator wishes to rise, I move that the debate be adjourned to Wednesday, May 18.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator—

[Translation]

Senator Bourget: Madam Speaker, if I may interrupt you, I do not know if Senator Adams intends to participate in the debate this week, but I do not think he will object to the adjournment motion proposed by Senator Asselin.

[English]

I am just asking Senator Adams if he has any objection to Senator Asselin's adjourning the debate until Wednesday of next week, because he told me a few minutes ago that he may participate this week. Owing to the fact that the proposed adjournment is to next week, I suppose there is no objection.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate until next week because the House of Commons studied this bill for months before making a decision. It would seem reasonable for us on this side of the house, there being so few of us, to take at least a few days to study the bill in order to make a positive contribution to this debate.

Senator Bourget: I for one have no objection. I think that Senator Asselin is certainly entitled to move the adjournment of the debate until Wednesday of next week. I think that Senator Adams will also agree.

[English]

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY BAN ON USE OF SACCHARIN—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator McDonald:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into and report upon the proposed ban on the use of saccharin.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I yield to the Honourable Senator Stanbury.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I think we are all grateful to the Honourable Senator Buckwold for bringing our attention to the very topical question of government regulation of saccharin in our country. Other senators have brought their own professional expertise or their layman's interest to bear on the subject in several interesting addresses that we have heard in this house. I think the ventilation of this question in a committee of the Senate can do nothing but good. It may disclose some fault or inadequacy in the procedures of an important government agency, or it may serve to increase the already substantial confidence the Canadian public has in agencies of government which are dedicated to their protection.

It is important at the beginning, I think, of such consideration to recognize the climate in which such agencies work these days. It was only a few years ago that mercury was found in the streams and lakes, that phosphates came along in detergents to change the biological environment, that people began to suspect that food additives which had made our drinks more colourful and our bread more fresh might be having some serious effects on the health of those of us who consumed the end product. Then it became fashionable for so-called experts to discover on almost a weekly basis that one food item or another was good for us or bad for us. Each such discovery was followed the next week by an equally certain discovery by an equally qualified expert that the first discovery was nonsense.

It became clear that sanity was only going to be restored to the question of safety or danger in any particular substance when governments took the responsibility for making these judgments. The food and drug laboratories of the United States and Canada began to announce their findings on the best evidence available to them after careful research. Of course, in almost every case the research was inadequate in scientific terms, and admittedly so, because most of the substances studied were of quite recent origin or of recent common usage. Unless the item was clearly poisonous or had an immediate effect on the human chemistry, it might take thirty or forty years of controlled experiments with human beings to be absolutely and scientifically sure. But most of these products are in everyday use by a great proportion of the public. To wait for scientific certainty would be to invite a major disaster. So government agencies had to find a quicker alternative.

For ethical and technical reasons it is extremely difficult to carry out direct human tests with suspected cancer-producing agents. In such circumstance science provides another approved procedure, which is to carry out the necessary studies with animals and to extrapolate the results to predict what will happen when the chemical involved is given to man. Because of the physical difference between man and animals, the difference in susceptibility to cancer-producing agents and the increased sensitivity of some human beings as compared to others, you have to be particularly careful to provide for a very high safety factor.

Many cancer experts, in fact, believe it to be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to set safety factors for cancer-producing agents. They believe that no amount of a cancer-producing chemical is safe. Others believe that a minimum safety factor must be in the order of 5,000 to 10,000. That is, if we determine the maximum level of chemical which does not produce cancer in animals we would permit only 1/5,000th or 1/10,000th of that amount in the human diet. I know it sounds a little ridiculous. In the case of the saccharin experiments the rats were given, on the basis of proportionate body weight, 800 times the saccharin which a human being would swallow in one 12-ounce bottle of diet pop. It is not very likely that any human being would drink 800 bottles of diet pop in a day. Besides, no case of human cancer attributable to saccharin has ever been identified. But the trouble is that the animal experiments, long before reaching the minimum safety factor science prescribes, found cancers in the bladders of some of the males of the first generation but much more commonly in the bladders of the males of the second generation.

While saccharin has been known since 1879, it is only within the last six or eight years that it has come into common use in relatively large quantities in diet drinks and diet foods as a replacement for cyclamates, and so on. It takes forty years for this kind of tumor to develop—a long time to wait to find out whether or not we have a national disaster on our hands.

As a layman I can, of course, make no assessment of the adequacy of the scientific work. I can only take note of the fact that an international panel of pathologists has reviewed the evidence and it was their consensus diagnosis upon which the government action was based. However, as a layman, I can assess the criteria upon which the public policy decision is based. Some of the press and individual comments would lead you to believe that there are no such criteria, that such a decision is made irresponsibly on the basis of recommendations by unqualified scientists. Of course, that is not true. There is a system in the department for making benefit/risk decisions. All possible variables are looked at to try to be sure that decisions are made on a rational basis.

First they look at the risk, the probability of a deleterious effect in man. That is a scientific measurement depending upon (a) the scientific validity of the experiments—in this case assessed by the reviewing scientists as unequivocal—and (b) the level and frequency of human exposure to the chemical. Then they assess the loss or damage that will result from leaving well enough alone or, on the other hand, from taking restrictive action. If the prospective damage is that relatively large numbers of people may suffer from cancer, that certainly becomes an important consideration. Cancer exerts extremely deleterious effects on its victims. It is impossible to even guess at the human suffering or the economic loss involved.

Then there is an examination of benefit. Is there a question of convenience, economic gain, relief of suffering, improved nutrition or improved quality of life? The benefit of saccharin is that it makes life a little more pleasant for those who must limit their intake of sugar, and therefore helps them to abide by the strict discipline by which they must live.

Another factor is acceptability. When risk is balanced against benefit, the risk will be considered by society to be acceptable in some situations but not in others. Cultural and philosophical factors often make decisions on the use of a particular chemical more difficult; for example, tobacco and alcohol. Government agencies, and even the government itself, have done a great deal to discourage smoking, but a democratic government can simply not abolish by fiat a habit to which almost 50 per cent of the adult population is addicted. Only a tremendous ground swell of public opinion would make this possible, but even though there have been some encouraging waves there is no such ground swell. But, of course, within living memory, attempts to prohibit alcohol consumption by government decree have been tried but they failed for lack of public support, so we continue to suffer the damage and loss brought about by the use of alcohol.

The public reaction to a food additive is quite different. They do not expect their government to permit manufacturers to put into commonly used foods any substance which is or even might be hazardous to their children or themselves. As a matter of fact, usually the hue and cry is to have some chemical banned just on the suspicion that it might be hazardous, and governments have to take the position that they have to have some reasonable evidence that the danger really exists. The evidence of risk has to be quite substantial to incite government action if the substance is essential for human health. In the case of saccharin there is no suggestion that it is essential. It is very useful to some people but by no means essential.

The combination of risk, benefit and acceptability have persuaded the government to make a number of rules to control the sale and use of saccharin. The department says that the decision was taken after consultation with the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Dental Association, the Canadian Diabetic Association and the Registrars of Pharmacy. In view of statements made by others there will no doubt be questions in committee as to the nature of those consultations.

The regulations take into account the needs of diabetics and others who wish to reduce their consumption of sugar for dietary reasons. They also take into account the need for a transition period for the industries involved.

Soft drinks, beverage mixes and beverage bases containing saccharin may be sold until October 1, 1977, and other foods until December 1, 1977. Saccharin may be sold anywhere until February 1, 1978, and thereafter in pharmacies without a prescription. While the sale of drugs and cosmetics containing saccharin will not be permitted after December 31, 1978, and December 31, 1979, respectively, you will notice that those dates are far enough in the future to permit an examination of each case and to permit exemptions to be given on the basis of the recommendations of medical experts.

Perhaps the most important thing to be said is that, in spite of the scare headlines, saccharin has not been banned. It is still available and will continue to be available for those who need it and for whom the risk of cancer is at least no greater than the risks they are already subjected to by existing health problems. But because of the evidence that it may be hazardous for human consumption it is being removed from the products which are commonly used by a very large proportion of the public who would otherwise consume them in ignorance of the presence of saccharin or in ignorance of the hazard of consuming it. That is surely the least that any government can do.

Having said that, I will conclude as I began. There is certainly no reason why Senator Buckwold's motion should not be adopted. There is no reason why a competent committee of the Senate should not examine the procedures which were followed, the evidence which was accepted and the criteria which were applied. The conclusions of the committee will either improve the basis for action by government in such matters, or will strengthen the confidence of the Canadian people in the apparatus through which they expect to be protected.

On motion of Senator Buckwold, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Order of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, respecting compensation plan between the Elmira Public Utilities Commission and the group of its non-office employees, represented by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, formerly local 2345, now local 636. Order dated May 9, 1977.

Copies of contract between the Government of Canada and the Province of New Brunswick for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, Chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970 (English text).

Copies of contract between the Government of Canada and the Province of Newfoundland for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, Chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970 (English text).

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED

Senator Lafond, Acting Joint Chairman of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, tabled the third report of the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to add a word of explanation. Although the Banking Committee made substantial progress this morning on its report on the study of the white paper on Canadian Banking legislation, it is necessary for the committee to sit this afternoon to complete its agenda for the day. The committee will sit at 2.30 this afternoon in room 356-S.

Motion agreed to.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—QUESTION

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government, based on the failure of the government to introduce adequate measures to deal with the situation now facing this country in which we have over one million unemployed. The last budget provided $100 million for job creation. This equals $1.75 per week for each person unemployed. Is it the intention of the government to create jobs with this money, or to give the unemployed $1.75 per week?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator's question really is not an interrogation in the traditional sense of the word. It is more in the nature of an inquiry. I would ask the honourable senator if I may take his question as such, to be printed on the order paper under "Inquiries." Perhaps the senator would like to initiate an inquiry and debate on the subject of unemployment.

Senator Grosart: He asked a question.

● (1410)

Senator Phillips: I will be very happy to do that when the Leader of the Government answers the inquiry now standing in my name on the order paper as to the number of people drawing unemployment insurance benefits.

Senator Flynn: Well put.

SPORTS

ORGANIZATION OF TEAM CANADA FOR FUTURE
INTERNATIONAL HOCKEY TOURNAMENTS—QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question with regard to Canada's image abroad as a result of our representation at the recent World Hockey Tournament in Vienna. When I posed a similar question to the leader on April 26, it was perhaps too soon after the first tournament game. However, since then we have all had a chance to observe what has happened to our image abroad.

I should like to ask the Leader if the Government would consider changing the method of organizing Team Canada so that this country would have better leadership and better representation in international hockey in the future. The leader of this team did not demonstrate the qualities expected of him as a sports ambassador of Canada, nor did he with the previous team.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molson: Although it is against our rules, if I might add a word of explanation, I should like to say that this year's team played well considering their capabilities, and I do not reflect on their playing ability in making these remarks. They played exceptionally well in at least three games against top teams, but at times throughout the tournament they acted in such a poor manner that it brought discredit to Canada. It is for this reason that I feel compelled to ask the government if we should not change the method of organizing our hockey team for future international competition.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, together with other senators I have been concerned about reports in the media with respect to the alleged conduct of some of Team Canada's representatives in the World Hockey Tournament which has just been completed in Vienna. However, I think we should wait for a report from team representatives, to determine whether or not there was provocation of which we are not aware. Secondly, I should point out that Team Canada finished two points out of first place and winning the gold medal, and under the circumstances played at least some of the games admirably well. All of us are aware of Senator Molson's extensive background in hockey. For this reason I shall certainly undertake to communicate to the minister responsible for sports and physical fitness the views he so eloquently expressed today.

I am sure that all of us join with the senator in hoping that at all times we can send our best possible representatives abroad, not only as far as their capabilities on the ice are concerned but their general deportment.

Senator Asselin: Perhaps we should send the Vancouver hockey team.

Senator Langlois: All we need is the Molson expert touch.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

AGREEMENTS BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—QUESTION

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government, with respect to the contract he tabled earlier between the Government of Canada and the Province of New Brunswick for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police if he could inform the house whether all provinces which previously had these agreements have now entered into new agreements, or, if not, what is the present status of those negotiations?

Senator Perrault: I must take that question as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING NUCLEAR SUPPLIES—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Could I ask the Leader of the Government what is the current status of the negotiations between Canada and other countries with which any Canadian company has a contractual commitment for nuclear supplies, particularly West Germany, Japan and Sweden?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I undertake to make a statement to the house at the earliest opportunity. I do not have that detailed information at my desk.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE INQUIRY

VOLUME ONE OF REPORT—QUESTION AND ANSWER

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether, in view of the large number of comments on the Berger Report from oil companies and native communities, he has yet been able to take the position that the appropriate Senate standing committee give an opportunity to these various people to express their views?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the proposal is being considered, and discussions were held today on the subject. However, may I say that it is difficult to know what shape such committee hearings would take or how much questioning would arise from the official opposition at committee hearings, in view of the fact that the Leader of the Conservative Party has expressed his outspoken support for the recommendations of the Berger Commission. I would be most interested in the views of the Leader of the Opposition on this subject.

Senator Flynn: Would you please read very carefully the statement of the leader of my party? You might then want to qualify what you have just said about it.

An Hon. Senator: "Unqualified support."

Senator Flynn: "Unqualified support" is wrong.

Senator Perrault: It is my understanding that the leader of the party represented here in the person of the Leader of the Opposition in this chamber expressed unstinting support for the Berger Report. I say this in no critical way. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition in this chamber may wish to clarify the position of his leader on this matter.

Senator Flynn: I am not entitled to reply to questions by Senator Austin. Besides, he never tells me in advance what he is going to ask me. He does tell you, however, and you have a political speech ready every time he puts a question. However, I am not afforded that advantage. I should be pleased to make clear, for your benefit, the position of our party on this matter. Once more I repeat that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has not correctly interpreted the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition in the other place.

Senator Perrault: I should be interested to know which one of his many statements. Which one of them?

Senator Flynn: If you don't know what you are talking about you should remain seated.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps this exchange of opinions on such an important matter could be carried on in a committee study.

Senator Flynn: It is ignorance on your part.

[Later:]

Senator Smith (Colchester): With reference to the question asked by Senator Austin, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government, having regard to the rules and powers of the Senate, if it is not within the competence of Senator Austin or any other member of the Senate to move that the subject matter of this report be referred to an appropriate committee?

Senator Phillips: Why not make it an inquiry?

Senator Perrault: Of course, that is the standard practice.

Senator Flynn: Senator Austin would not move it without the blessing of the Leader of the Government.

Senator Austin: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he would take up with the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate the desirability of the Transport and Communications Committee's holding these hearings, and I would ask Senator Flynn whether he would agree that this would be desirable?

Senator Flynn: A question cannot be put to me, but I am quite sure that I would be hurting any cause by lending it my support.

Senator Perrault: In the past I have found the Leader of the Opposition to be most cooperative in matters which would advance the interests of the Senate, and I would very much like to discuss these and other matters of mutual interest with him.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I should like, then, to ask the Leader of the Government if there is any obstacle to Senator Austin's giving notice of an inquiry in the ordinary sense, under the rules of the house, in order to express his views on this matter.

RESIGNATION OF CHAIRMAN—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Benidickson about the illness of Mr. Robert Bryce, which has obliged him to resign as chairman and only full-time commissioner of the Royal Commission on Concentration of Corporate Power. The question was:

What steps does the government propose to take, at least in part, to rectify this deplorable situation?

The resignation of the chairman of a royal commission is, in the view of the government, virtually without precedent. It poses a particularly difficult problem in the present case; first, because though the commission's research program is almost complete, its report is still largely unfinished; and second, because the composition of this commission has been from its outset a matter of concern in some quarters.

Anticipating that Mr. Bryce's loss at this point from the commission would further aggravate this concern, the government has discussed with the remaining commissioners, Mr. Pierre Nadeau and Mr. Robert Dickerson, various means of remedying the situation. Included amongst these were a proposal to replace Mr. Bryce and another to transfer by reference the commission's work to the Economic Council of Canada. However, in the light of the desire of the remaining commissioners to report without delay, and given the intended departure early this fall of key members of the commission's staff, it was concluded that none of these means were feasible and that Mr. Bryce should not, and probably could not, be replaced.

Consequently, the government has asked the remaining commissioners to carry on. The government is confident that they will take full account of the views that have been presented to them.

Other questions have been raised in other quarters with respect to Mr. Bryce's resignation and may I say on behalf of the government that it was never proposed to any of the commissioners that they be relieved of their duties; that one of the government's principal objectives throughout the discussion was to ensure that the views of the commissioners and such research papers as they wished would be published; and that at no time in the discussions with the commissioners was the subject of the government's proposed Competition Act, much less any other of the many matters more central to the commission's terms of reference, raised either by the government or the commissioners.

THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS

Senator Austin: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government, in view of Senator Flynn's address in this chamber on May 3 regarding Conservative senators, whether he can confirm that Robert Stanfield has been offered an appointment to this chamber, and has not accepted?

Senator Grosart: Order, order. Come on!

Senator Walker: You should know.

Senator Grosart: Let us have a little decency here.

Senator Flynn: It is up to the Leader of the Government to reply.

PENSION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Carter moved the third reading of Bill C-11, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ENTITLEMENTS ADJUSTMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-52, to provide for the consideration of certain unemployment insurance entitlements.

He said: Honourable senators, I am indeed pleased to have the opportunity of moving the second reading of Bill C-52, to provide for the consideration of certain unemployment insurance entitlements. Bill C-52, if passed, will authorize the Unemployment Insurance Commission to reconsider those cases where claimants were disentitled as the result of the coming into force of the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act contained in Bill C-69, and make payments where applicable to claimants age 65 years of age and over and those eligible for the dependency rate.

First, I should like to give a brief explanation of how the requirement for this particular piece of legislation arose. Prior to the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 contained in Bill C-69, claimants were eligible for benefits until reaching the age of 70 or until becoming eligible for either Canada Pension Plan or Quebec Pension Plan benefits.

The Unemployment Insurance Act also provided under certain circumstances a benefit rate of 75 per cent of average weekly insurable earnings for claimants with dependants. Bill C-69, assented to on December 20, 1975, reduced the maximum age for coverage and eligibility to 65 years of age and removed the special dependency rate. Those amendments were introduced on the basis that enrichment of federal social security programs in the intervening years had eliminated the need for such special benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

As of January 4, 1976, all claims were terminated for those persons 65 years of age and over who were already receiving benefits, and that affected approximately 17,000 claimants. Similarly, as of that same date, all claimants receiving the dependency rate of 75 per cent were reduced to the general rate of 66⅔ per cent, and that affected approximately 176,000 claimants.

Some 600 claimants 65 years of age and over appealed the termination of their benefits. In addition, two claimants appealed the termination of the dependency rate. The appeals were upheld by the boards of referees, the first level of appeal under the Unemployment Insurance Act. The commission then appealed to an umpire of the Federal Court of Canada. Mr. Justice Addy of the Federal Court heard the appeals and rendered decisions in favour of the claimants.

It should be emphasized at this time that the decisions in question apply only to those who had established claims prior to January 4, 1976. Mr. Justice Addy also ruled that the amendments provided clear authority for the commission to terminate benefits to those attaining the age of 65 years of age, and to eliminate the dependency rate in respect of claims established after January 4, 1976.

In essence, Mr. Justice Addy held that since the wording of the pertinent clauses in Bill C-69 did not remove acquired rights, the commission should not have terminated benefits for those aged 65 years and over, or reduced benefits for those eligible for the dependency rate of benefit in the case of those who were already claimants. Based on considerations of equity, it was decided to accord the same treatment to those claimants affected by Bill C-69, but who did not appeal. Legal authority is required to reconsider and pay these claims since the Unemployment Insurance Act does not now provide the necessary legal basis for doing so.

Honourable senators, Bill C-52, which is now before us, provides the authority for the Commission to consider the claims of those affected by Bill C-69. I am informed that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is well advanced in its plans to implement the government's decision to reconsider and make payments where applicable to the approximately 17,000 individuals of 65 years of age and over, and the approximately 176,000 individuals eligible for the dependency rate of benefit. The commission, therefore, will be able to make prompt payment to eligible claimants when this bill receives royal assent.

In view of the importance of this bill, I would urge honourable senators to lend their support to its approval. I am not going to be too insistent about its rapid disposal, but I would remind honourable senators that in the other place this bill went through the three stages without interruption within a matter of a few minutes on May 9. I would also mention that arrangements are now being made to have royal assent late tomorrow afternoon to two other bills, and if this bill were assented to at that time I think it would be of some help to those claimants who have been waiting now since January 4, 1976 for these adjustments in their retirement benefits.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, Bill C-52 is necessary as a result of the 1975 budget, a budget introduced by the then Minister of Finance, the Honourable John Turner.

The main preoccupation of Grits today is to bemoan the fate of the Liberal Party. They do not discuss the economy, unemployment, inflation or any of the other numerous ills affecting Canada. Their concern is the fate of the Liberal Party. It is very interesting to hear a large number of Liberals—in fact the majority—saying that a cure lies in dumping Prime Minister Trudeau and bringing back Mr. Turner. I think this bill clearly shows that Mr. Turner was not the “whiz kid” that many pretend.

The budget of 1975 removed all those aged 65 to 70 years from unemployment insurance benefits. The budget speech described the move as one of the five major elements of the government's program for expenditure restraint. It went on to say that the cost of running the new system was proving to be rather expensive. It had cost $2.3 billion in 1974-75, and would cost over $3 billion in 1975-76.

The budget proposed five changes, some of which have been outlined by the sponsor of the bill, but it is interesting to note that the five changes all affect those less able to care for themselves. The changes would result in a saving of $3 million per year.

The then Minister of Manpower and Immigration, Mr. Andras, in introducing Bill C-69 described it as improved support for the age group of 65 to 70. We must ask ourselves, honourable senators, how Bill C-52 brings about the improved support allegedly seen by Mr. Andras.

On April 12, 1976 a question was raised in the House of Commons concerning a decision reached by the appeal board. The government indicated that they did not accept the decision of the appeal board, and they attempted to appeal to a higher court. On February 10 of this year, a further question was raised in the House of Commons, and in reply Mr. Cullen, now the minister responsible, stated that it might require a minor amendment to the present legislation. He then went on to say that the Department of Justice had advised him that in all probability an amendment would not be required. I wonder what happened to that advice, and what the alternative was that the minister had in mind on that occasion.

Senator Langlois has told us that it would be desirable to have royal assent to this bill tomorrow evening. I have no objection to its being read the second time today, and giving it third reading either today or tomorrow, depending on the wishes of the government. However, I have a number of questions and I should like to direct them to the sponsor before concluding my remarks.

My first question has to do with the procedure which is to be followed when an application is made for reinstatement of benefits. As honourable senators are aware, regulations now require an individual applying for unemployment insurance benefits to present proof of daily attempts to obtain employment. These people are now 67 years of age. They have lost two years through no fault of their own. Are we going to require them to go out and pound the streets looking for employment every day, as required by Canada Manpower?

The second question I would ask the sponsor of the bill concerns the method to be followed in notifying those affected by Bill C-52. Bill C-69 removed the rights of some 14,000 Canadians, and only 600 of them appealed. How will the others be notified?

My third question concerns the benefits coming to those who have died in the interval. What procedure is to be followed in such cases? Will a survivor receive the benefits to which the deceased was entitled, or will the deceased be required to make application from the grave?

A further question concerns interest to be paid on payments that were due in January 1976. In the case of overpayment of income tax, the government pays interest. Will that course be followed in this case?

Andrew Young, United States Ambassador to the United Nations, recently got himself into hot water by referring to the legitimacy of the South African government. I would not wish the sponsor of the bill or the government to consider this as recognition of the legitimacy and respectability of this government. So long as they bear that in mind, we will be happy to proceed with the bill.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, the course of action to be followed is very simple. Those who are entitled to claim should file an application.

I was informed this morning that there is presently in effect a procedure for enabling prompt settlement of potential claims, and that regional offices are reviewing their files to ensure that no one is overlooked. Should individuals fail to make application, there is a strong possibility that the department will be able to deal with those claims rapidly by reviewing its files in the regional offices—and this even though formal applications have not been made to the commission. As honourable senators can see, the normal procedure of the commission is being set aside in these cases, and every effort will be made to enable future claimants to receive their benefits.

The purpose of the bill is to look after those who have not appealed, those who are not in the group of 600 who have protected their rights by appealing beforehand. It is to protect the claims of those who have not as yet filed a claim. The bill is quite clear in that respect.

Senator Phillips: I am sorry for interrupting the deputy leader, but my question was: Will those people be notified of the passing of the legislation and the restoration of their rights?

Senator Langlois: Legislation is normally notified to the public through proclamation following royal assent. As I have already mentioned, the regional offices of the commission have been asked to review their files and to go after those possible claimants who, from the records, appear to be entitled to additional benefits or adjustments to their benefits. Everything possible is being done to seek out those future claimants.

With regard to those who have died, I have no direct information on this particular point but I am inclined to believe that the estates of those who have died will be entitled to file a claim. The regional offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission will check its files to ascertain the names of deceased persons who were entitled to these additional benefits at the time of death, and those benefits will likely be sent to their estates.

I am sorry that I overlooked the aspect of interest. I undertake to look into the matter, and will make a statement to the house at the first opportunity, probably prior to third reading.

With regard to the amount of money to be paid, the deputy minister informed me this morning that the best estimate is $20 million.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the sponsor of the bill if he can tell us when the bill, from which this provision was taken, was introduced? I understand it was part of a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. It was finally taken out to form the present bill, because of the fact that other provisions of the bill were not immediately acceptable to the house. Therefore, I should like to know when the bill from which this provision was taken was introduced.

Senator Langlois: Is the Leader of the Opposition referring to the 1971 bill?

Senator Flynn: The bill which is before the other place, and from which this amendment was taken.

Senator Langlois: The Leader of the Opposition is referring to the 1971 act. As the honourable senator will see, clause 2 of the present bill provides:

Notwithstanding section 102 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971—

Senator Flynn: When was this provision, which was part of another bill, introduced in the other place in that other bill? This is not a new bill.

Senator Langlois: I know that, but I do not have that information.

Senator Flynn: I was going to suggest—

Senator Langlois: The Leader of the Opposition wants the date the bill was introduced in the other place. Unfortunately, I do not have that information at my fingertips.

Senator Flynn: I suggest that it has been before the other place for more than four months.

Senator Langlois: I would say so.

Senator Macdonald: December 9.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Leave having been given to revert to reports of Committees:

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, I wish to remedy an omission which was made previously. Earlier today I presented the third report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. May I now ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this date.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 694-7.)

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY BAN ON USE OF SACCHARIN

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Buckwold that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into and report upon the proposed ban on the use of saccharin.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Buckwold speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the substantive motion before the house.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, on March 31 of this year I had the privilege of moving the motion I am now speaking to for the last time, and I take this opportunity of thanking the many senators who participated in the debate. Senator Rowe, Senator McDonald, Senator Grosart, Senator Sullivan and Senator Stanbury all made significant contributions to a subject which, though not very important to many, is a matter of real concern to hundreds of thousands of Canadians. I want to refer particularly to the remarks of Senator Sullivan which, in my opinion, were outstanding, since not only did he give a brilliant presentation, but one based on scientific fact and a lifetime of experience in this rather complicated field of toxicology.

All the speakers agreed that this was a controversial subject, and one that was certainly worthy of committee study, with the reservation made by Senator Sullivan that he felt that further epidemiological studies should be concluded before a committee looks at the subject, although he did say in the course of his speech:

I cannot help but suggest that the action taken by the government has been premature and precipitate, and is an over-reaction based on unsubstantiated and inadequate scientific review.

So Senator Sullivan certainly supports my contention that this matter is worthy of review although, as I say, he did have some reservations as to its timing. I pay tribute again to Senator Sullivan for a remarkable presentation.

Since I made my original proposal, and moved this motion, a significant amount of additional information has come forward. There is a growing resentment on the part of the general public, as well as on the part of the scientific community, about the subject, and a feeling that it really needs further review. I will not bore you with all the statements that have been made, because you have seen them yourselves in the press, but here is one from the Toronto Star of April 13 last: "Test finds saccharin not linked to cancer." The article deals with a further report by Johns Hopkins University indicating that the consumption of saccharin has no "significant effect" on the development of bladder cancer, as a result of a study on monkeys that was carried out by that institution. Another statement is:

The federal government's ban on saccharin was probably premature, Dr. David Irving, president-elect of the Alberta Medical Association said Wednesday.

There has been a wide variety of protests across the country to the effect that further investigation is required. As a matter of fact, Senator Hayakawa, a United States senator from California, is drafting a bill designed to block the ban on saccharin announced by the American Food and Drug Administration. These are just some indications of the fact that this is a controversial subject.

Let me say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare may indeed be absolutely correct, and it is not my objective to be in any way critical. The fact is that if any of us were in the position of the minister, we would more than likely have reacted in the same way, and it could be that a study by a committee would completely support the stand taken by the minister. On the other hand, I think the department would probably welcome a detailed study of the whole situation which would clarify the situation in the minds of the general public.

I have in front of me a reprint of an article by Dr. W. Gifford-Jones, published in one of the Ottawa newspapers, who indicates:

Yet you also have to throw a pinch of common sense even into test-tube experimentation.

It is at this point, of course, that the whole situation breaks down. When you feed rats immense quantities of saccharin and come up with a result, does that in fact prove that in a human situation the reaction would be similar? There are many people who claim otherwise. Dr. Gifford-Jones concludes by saying:

Finally, perhaps our scientists should be more consistent in their efforts to protect us from every evil. Here they are recommending a ban on saccharin without proof it has been linked to one human case of cancer while thousands of people are killing themselves with uncontrolled use of alcohol and tobacco, and fish are becoming unsafe to eat because of widespread dumping of chemicals into our lakes and rivers.

These are just some of the anomalies that have developed as a result of this particular situation.

We heard an excellent address yesterday by Senator Stanbury who, in my opinion, gave a first-class departmental response to this question. There is no doubt that the department is well able to justify what it has done, but we heard nothing in that response on the other side of the question, namely, the benefits, as opposed to the ill effects, for those to whom the ban on saccharin will become very important.

We heard nothing, for example, of the plight of diabetics. Diabetics—and there are tens of thousands of them—require more than just the use of the drug saccharin. The department is saying, "We are not banning saccharin. You will still be able to go to the drugstore and buy your little bottle of saccharin to put in your coffee," but that is not really the problem. The problem is the whole question of sweetening for a variety of foods that makes life much more pleasant and tolerable for people who have that particular problem. I suggest that for juvenile diabetics—and there are tens of thousands of them also—having artificially sweetened soft drinks and artificially sweetened candy and other foods is a very important aspect of the control of their blood sugar and their general intake of carbohydrates.

I believe that the problem of obesity is something that has to be reviewed, and many responsible medical people—experts in their field—are indicating that the possible risk of cancer of the bladder as a result of the intake of saccharin would never offset the damage that would be done by the increase in weight of tens of thousands of Canadians—taken collectively, it would be measured in tons—as a result of the use of sugar in many of their foods which at present are artificially sweetened.

In addition, I do not think we can ignore the importance of dental caries which would result from the elimination of the use of saccharin. I am thinking, for example, of chewing gum. Chewing may not be an acceptable habit, but chewing gum is certainly widely used. There is a demand for artificially sweetened chewing gum. I am sure that many of us use it. I had a package the other day, and it contained the statement: "Recommended by four out of five dentists." My dental friends tell me that one of the major causes of caries or cavities in teeth, especially the teeth of children, is the use of foods sweetened with sugar. All in all, honourable senators, it is evident that this subject is one that is worthy of review.

I was pleased to note that the minister has postponed the implementation of the ban, and authorized a short-term extension of the permitted use of saccharin. The government has agreed to allow the sale of soft drinks, beverage mixes and beverage bases containing saccharin until October 1, 1977, and of other foods containing saccharin until December 31, 1977. This is important from the point of view of the committee study, because it meets the objection of our distinguished colleague Senator Sullivan. It gives the committee time in which to review the situation. There is not the urgency that there was perhaps a month ago, before this extension was announced. The committee will be able to take the time necessary to obtain the kind of expert witnesses required in order to perform a service for the Canadian public. I think they are entitled to that.

Honourable senators, I hope you will support this motion, and that in due course, the committee will study this matter and present a report with recommendations that can be passed on to the minister.

Senator Flynn: Would the honourable senator permit a question? If I understand correctly, he suggests that there are studies that will go on until October, anyway, and there has been a postponement of the ban in certain areas to October 1. Would he say that the committee might undertake not to make a final report before that time?

Senator Buckwold: I think I would have to leave that, Senator Flynn, to the committee itself. They may decide to do it before; they may decide to do it after. I am not in any way suggesting what their time-table should be.

Senator Flynn: Will you be suggesting what it should be in committee?

Senator Buckwold: I am not a member of that committee, but I certainly hope to attend the meetings.

Senator Flynn: I think you should be a member of the committee.

Senator Buckwold: If my Whip, or the leader, is prepared to put me on the committee, I shall be very pleased to serve. I shall keep an open mind, until we have heard the witnesses and considered their evidence, and know what the programs are, as to the date a report should be forthcoming.

Senator Flynn: I think it would help some of us to vote for the motion if we could be assured that the committee will not rush into this task, and bring in a report prematurely, but that it will undertake to wait until all of the evidence that is going to be available in five months' time, for instance, is in.

Senator Buckwold: I think I indicated in my speech that I hope this kind of procedure will be followed; that all the evidence will be heard. In fact, even if the report is delayed until after the ban, as long as that is in the interests of a more scientific report, and it is based on evidence that may be forthcoming, then certainly that is the way it should be. It should be a report that is based on the very best information available, and the time schedule should not necessarily be the deciding factor.

Senator Flynn: What about the chairman? Will he agree to wait until October to report?

Senator Langlois: He is only the chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator McDonald, that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into and report upon the proposed ban on the use of saccharin.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, on division.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, April 27, the debate on the consideration of the second report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I would not have wanted this debate on the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments to end without a member of the official opposition's taking part in it, the main reason being that this report is an excellent one. It is a thoroughly scholarly effort for which the committee—and especially its distinguished and tireless co-chairmen, Mr. McCleave of the other place, and our good friend, Senator Forsey, and the staff—deserve our highest praise. This was pioneer work, with all the difficulties and frustrations usually associated with that type of effort. I know, because I was a member of the committee at the outset, but because of the requirements placed on my time by other responsibilities, it was not possible for me to continue to be a member of it for very long. The amount of work involved, and all the impediments set up by petulant bureaucrats, would have discouraged lesser men than the members of this joint committee.

The fruit of the committee's efforts is confirmation of the fact that we have reason to worry about our rights, and we have reason to be concerned about individual freedoms.

The committee's scrutinizing of some of the subordinate legislation in this country has indicated that there exist abuses of delegated authority, and that we would do well to take steps to guard against them more effectively. We are warned by this report to see to it that the lines are very clearly drawn with regard to how far government bureaucrats can go in interpreting legislation through regulations. Also, we are warned to watch that those to whom we give a power do not themselves pass it on until it gets so far down the line that we lose sight of it, and thus control over it.

Much of the present subordinate legislation, as we had suspected, seems not to have its foundation in law. That is, it neither reflects the spirit nor the letter of the law. It is the product of the misguided efforts of over-zealous and overbearing bureaucrats. They were likely trying to interpret or flesh out the laws we enacted, and they ended up, whether consciously or not, going astray. So definitely this is one area where we will have to exercise a great deal of vigilance in the future.

But we will be hampered in our work by a factor brought to light by Senator Lang when he participated in this debate. Senator Lang pointed out that there is a dangerous conflict of interest in having the same minister responsible for ensuring that the government act according to the rule of law as is responsible for advising the government on how to frustrate the spirit while acting within the letter of the law. The role of the Attorney General is that of the defence attorney trying to find loopholes and interpretations to make legal the actions of his client. When both of these functions come to be joined in one and the same person, then we have an obvious conflict of interest about which the government should do something if it wants to help us keep control over delegated authority.

But I should be more precise. The problem is not so much with the powers of the minister himself but the situation to which they give rise. As it is, the Department of Justice has two functions: they draft regulations or vet those that have been drafted by the departments. They point out to client departments what they can and cannot do according to the authority given them in the legislation. But then, acting for the Attorney General, that same group of men must find a way of legitimizing or legalizing a regulation which they may have found was not acceptable in the circumstances, if the client department insists on it.

Small wonder, then, that the Department of Justice should have told the committee in a number of instances that the confidentiality of the lawyer-client relationship prevented them from commenting on the legality of certain regulations. They were not always of that opinion. I remember well a discussion between my good friend Senator Langlois and myself after he had finally obtained a legal opinion from the Department of Justice about the validity, from a constitutional viewpoint, of a provision in a piece of legislation before the committee. When it suits them, they come across with answers; when it does not suit them they invoke the confidentiality of the lawyer-client relationship.

To get back to the difficulties encountered by the joint committee, the representatives of the Department of Justice, whose role it is to uphold the rule of law, should have replied. As agents of the Department of Justice, they had probably advised the client department that the regulation about which the committee was inquiring was ultra vires. But, as agents of the Attorney General, they probably found a way to get around the problem. To admit anything would have been to underline a perfectly untenable position, a blatant conflict of interest which is a very unhealthy one for the welfare of all Canadians. So they refused to reply.

A partial solution could be for the government to no longer combine the functions of Minister of Justice and Attorney General in the same person. But that is only part of the solution. This committee, I think, must have more than the authority to merely scrutinize and report. It must have the authority to call for and be given every blessed rule, regulation, instrument, order, et cetera, that was ever drafted; it must have the authority to examine the basics upon which all delegated authority is given, how it is exercised, and what effect it is having; it must have the authority to demand explanations of those who pass these regulations; and finally, Parliament must have the authority, and the opportunity, to reject regulations which it considers are not in keeping with the law upon which they are supposedly based. It is not fair to leave such matters entirely up to the courts. Nor is it fair to leave them to individual citizens who have been injured by the rule and must now seek redress before the courts. Some way must be found to deal quickly and effectively with any rule, regulation or order of the government which is found to be illegal, or a breach of natural justice, or an unusual or unexpected use of a given power. Parliament must itself police the use that is made of delegated authority.

If some are uncomfortable with the idea of a committee of Parliament keeping track of regulations on a day-to-day basis, perhaps we could create a post which in regulatory matters would be equivalent to that of the Auditor General in financial matters. I tried to find a title, and one was suggested to me by my good friend Senator Lang. It could be counsel general. This person would be charged with keeping watch over all the rules and regulations that are written, and report to a committee of Parliament any abuses of authority that he might detect.

This would give us continuous review by an objective unpoliticized authority. This might even be better than having the matter attended to directly by a committee made up of senators and members of the House of Commons. The latter two groups could become the final arbiters in a joint committee; the equivalent, in regulatory matters, of the Public Accounts Committee in matters of government spending. The report of the counsel general could be referred to this joint committee. The more I think of the idea the more I like it. A quarterly report, or even a biannual report, by a body such as this could conceivably be given enough public attention to force us legislators to look carefully at, and act quickly upon, any rules or regulations which were excessive or entirely out of order.

I think the problem of delegated authority is one that deserves very close attention. The potential for danger is great.

I have added a few suggestions to the excellent suggestions that were made by those who preceded me in this debate. I am sure that, if there is a will to do so, a method can be found to efficiently and effectively keep track of delegated authority, and see to it that it does not undermine representative authority.

For the time being, I congratulate the committee. I urge it to continue its work. Parliament is well served by this committee, but it could be better served if the committee were helped further in the ways that have been suggested.

On motion of Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE

WEDNESDAY, May 11, 1977

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Third Report as follows:

1. In accordance with its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Committee has reviewed and scrutinized the Domestic First Class Mail Regulations, SOR/76-552, the Second Class Mail Regulations, amendment, SOR/76-553, and the Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order, SI/76-101.

2. Your Committee reports that, in its judgment, section 6 of the Domestic First Class Mail Regulations, Items 1 and 2 of Schedule A to the Second Class Mail Regulations, amendment, and the Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order infringe criterion 4, constituting unusual and unexpected uses of section 13 of the Financial Administration Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-10, in that they invade the traditional rights of Parliament to settle by statute the rates of postage for letters of one pound or less and for Canadian newspapers and periodicals. It is also the view of your Committee that the validity of these impugned provisions is not beyond question. Detailed reasons are given in the attached statement.

3. Section 6 of the Domestic First Class Mail Regulations provides a new and higher scale of rates for letters posted within Canada for the period 1st September 1976 to 28th February 1977, with a basic rate of 10¢ for the first ounce, and a further and higher scale for the period commencing on 1st March 1977, with a basic rate of 12¢ for the first ounce. Each scale is expressed to apply "notwithstanding section 10 of the Post Office Act", which section also provides a statutory scale of rates. Section 10 was last amended by S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 53, section 5, which set a basic rate of 8¢ for the first ounce, on and after 1st January 1972.

Items 1 and 2 of Schedule A to the Second Class Mail Regulations, amendment, set a new scale of rates for postage on Canadian newspapers and periodicals, as defined in section 11 of the Post Office Act and posted in Canada on or after 1st March 1977 for delivery in Canada. These rates are expressed to apply "notwithstanding section 11 of the Post Office Act", which section also provides a statutory scale of rates. Section 11 was last amended by S.C. 1968-69 c. 5, section 4.

The authority for both regulations is the Postmaster General Authority to prescribe Fees Order, SI/76-101, made under section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act.

4. The postage rates for letters of less than one pound and for defined Canadian newspapers and periodicals, posted in Canada for delivery in Canada, have hitherto been fixed by an Act of Parliament in keeping with the sensitivity of those rates as affecting all Canadians, either in their pockets or in their freedom of access to the press. Your Committee concludes from the structure of the Post Office Act and the close attention Parliament has always given to letter rate increases in particular that, while Parliament has been content to allow rates, other than for letters and Canadian newspapers and periodicals, to be fixed by regulation made by the Postmaster General, yet it has intended to reserve to itself any alteration in those rates. To achieve what Parliament intended to do, or not to do at its will, by regulation under the authority of an Order under section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act is an unusual and unexpected use by the Crown of that particular enabling power.

5. Your Committee is particularly concerned to bring to the attention of the two Houses the fact that what has previously been a jealously guarded right has been taken away from Parliament and vested in an officer of the executive government of Canada. Parliament has been bypassed by the use, even the doubtful use, of a little known section of the Financial Administration Act.

6. In announcing on 21st May 1976 the postal increases achieved by these Regulations, the then Postmaster General, Mr. Mackasey, informed the House of Commons that he intended to proceed not by the introduction of legislation but by regulation and order under section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act. In 1974 in a written answer to a question, another former Postmaster General, Mr. Ouellet, replied:

"Rates of postage for domestic letter mail are set out in section 10 of the Post Office Act. Changes in these rates, therefore, are possible only by act of Parliament. Any proposals for amending the Post Office Act would be announced in the government's legislative program, at the appropriate time."

Your Committee respectfully commends to the Houses this latter approach as the only one consonant with the privileges, rights and traditions of Parliament.

7. Your Committee's consideration of the statutory instruments under report, including its correspondence with the Postmaster General and his Assistant Deputy Minister, will be found in its Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of 9th November 1976, 10th February 1977 and 17th March 1977.

STATEMENT OF REASONS

1. The Domestic First Class Mail Regulations and the Second Class Mail Regulations, amendment, are regarded by the Crown as being regulations and statutory instruments within the meaning of those terms in the Statutory Instruments Act. The Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order is not regarded by the Crown as being a statutory instrument. For the reasons explained in your Committee's Second Report, this point is not conceded.

2. It is necessary to explain how the Postmaster General came to make the two regulations now reported, apparently flying in the face of the Post Office Act. The structure of rate fixing provided for in the Post Office Act is that, letter mail and defined Canadian newspapers and periodicals apart, the rates are to be set by the Postmaster General, under section 6(d) of the Post Office Act, which empowers him to make regulations.

"(d) establishing rates of postage on any class of mailable matter, including letter mail, for which a rate is not established by this Act."

The words "including letter mail" were added to this paragraph by S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 53, section 2(1). Those new words are necessarily limited by the concluding words of the paragraph to letters weighing more than one pound and do not permit the Postmaster General to make regulations overriding the express provisions of section 10 of the Post Office Act. It was not, therefore, under section 6 of the Post Office Act that the Postmaster General acted in setting either the new letter rates or the new newspaper and periodical rates, but under section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act, and Order in Council SI/1976-101, Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order. Under section 13 of the Financial Administration Act, the Governor in Council may, in certain circumstances, authorize a Minister to prescribe the fee or charge to be paid by the person to whom a service or the use of a facility is provided by Her Majesty. The terms of section 13 are as follows:

"13. Where a service or the use of a facility is provided by Her Majesty to any person and the Governor in Council is of opinion that the whole or part of the cost of providing the service or the use of the facility should be borne by the person to whom it is provided, the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, may

(a) subject to the provisions of any Act relating to that service or the use of that facility, by regulation prescribe the fee or charge to be paid by the person to whom the service or the use of the facility is provided, or

(b) notwithstanding the provisions of any Act relating to that service or the use of that facility but subject to and in accordance with such terms and conditions as may be specified by the Governor in Council, authorize the appropriate Minister to prescribe the fee or charge to be paid by the person to whom the service or the use of the facility is provided."

3. The authority to act under section 13(b) was conferred upon the Postmaster General by SI/76-101, Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order. That Order simply permitted the Postmaster General to set letter rates for the two periods already mentioned and rates for newspapers and periodicals from 1st March 1977 notwithstanding sections 10 and 11 respectively of the Post Office Act. No other terms and conditions were prescribed.

4. Your Committee has on two previous occasions encountered fee-increasing regulations made pursuant to an authority conferred by Order of the Governor in Council under section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act in situations in which a statutory scale of fees had been prescribed by Parliament: SOR/73-548, Copyright Fees Order and SOR/73-549, Industrial Design Fees Order. Both these Orders covered fees charged for specific services provided on demand by and to interested individuals who wished to search records, register documents and so forth. A general function availed of by all Canadians was not involved. In view of its detailed examination of section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act on the present occasion, these two Fees Orders will be re-examined as to vires.

5. Your Committee has caused to be examined all the other Fees Orders made pursuant to section 13 of the Financial Administration Act and published in the Canada Gazette, Part II subsequent to the 1955 Consolidation of the Regulations. The result shows that, in addition to the Copyright and Industrial Design Fees Orders, five other Fees Orders deriving authority from section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act were made, but in situations in which no statutory scale of charges or rates had been prescribed by Parliament.² In each case the fees so prescribed were to be levied for services provided in individual cases when the persons or corporations who either requested or were provided with the services were identifiable. The Orders examined fell into the following categories:

(a) where the Minister prescribed fees under an Order made pursuant to section 13(b) where the Governor in Council could have prescribed fees by regulation under the direct authority conferred by another Act;³

(b) where there was no charge prescribed by statute and no specific authority in or under any Act of Parliament to set fees or charges and the service seems originally to have been provided free of charge.⁴

In both categories the services for which the charges were prescribed exist only for the benefit of persons who specifically ask for them. In neither category had Parliament prescribed a scale of charges or fees.

6. In contrast with all previous cases, including the Copyright Fees and Industrial Design Fees Orders, the Regulations dealt with in this Report have been made where

(a) Parliament has by statute prescribed a scale of rates or charges;

(b) the "service" for which the fees have purportedly been prescribed is not in any real sense provided in individual cases where the person or corporation requesting or being provided with the service is identifiable; and

(c) the "service" was never provided free of charge.

In the case of the Copyright Fees and the Industrial Design Fees Orders, although Parliament had prescribed fees and the services concerned were never provided free, the services are provided in individual cases to identifiable individuals who have made a specific request for each service provided.

7. In the Regulations under report, "fees" have been prescribed that change the statutory rates for the principal postal service of the Postmaster General provided to all Canadians, and for the important newspaper and periodical post. Your Committee considers that it is at least arguable that the postal service for letters, newspapers and periodicals is not a service, or does not constitute a number of individual services, within the meaning of the word "service" in section 13 of the Financial Administration Act, since the postal services involved are not made available to identifiable persons or corporations who request or are provided with the service. This seems even clearer in this case, as these functions of the Postmaster General are part of what is traditionally accounted a primary and inalienable function of government. In the case of letter mail, the Postmaster General's function is also a monopoly by force of section 8 of the Post Office Act.

The emphasis in section 13 is on the person to whom a service is provided. This indicates that the recipient of the service is identifiable and not an anonymous member of the general public to whom a general governmental service is provided. The word "person", the definite article "the", the indefinite article "a" and the personal pronoun "whom" must be given some meaning in limiting the scope of section 13. It is true that section 26(7) of the Interpretation Act provides that words in the singular include the plural but that rule of construction only applies unless a contrary intention appears (Interpretation Act, section 3(1)). Section 13 clearly indicates that the singular words within it were deliberately used. Your Committee notes that its construction of section 13 accords with that adopted by the Auditor General of Canada. Dealing with the then section 18 of the Financial Administration Act, which corresponds with the present section 13 except for paragraph (b) which was added by S.C. 1968-69, c. 27, the Audit Office Guide states:

The purpose of course is to vest in the Governor in Council the authority to impose charges for services rendered for the special benefit of some person or group. When that is done, regulations made are binding on departments.

143. ... Audit interest is less in the non-application of section 18 to services where the public generally benefit ..."

8. Your Committee considers that it is also at least arguable not only that section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act is limited in its application to specific services provided to identifiable individuals, but also that it is the intent of the section that it shall apply where the service or use of the facility has hitherto been provided free of charge, or in the absence of some charge otherwise imposed. It seems to your Committee at least plausible that the opening words of section 13, with their emphasis on the opinion of the Governor in Council that the whole or part of the cost of providing the service or use of the facility should be borne by the person to whom it is provided, indicate that where there is no recovery of cost, a fee may be levied. It can hardly be said of a "service" for which a fee is already established that the whole or part of the cost of providing it or of making it available is not being borne by the person to whom it is provided. The Post Office is already recovering part of its cost of letter, newspaper and periodical mail. It may well be recovering all its costs of each of those particular "services" for aught that is known.

9. Your Committee also considers that the words "the provisions of any Act relating to such service or the use of that facility" in section 13(b) may well be restricted to statutory provisions that govern the making available of the service or facility, even free of charge, or the empowering of the Governor in Council to fix fees by regulation, and do not encompass express statutory provisions that set scales of rates or charges for governmental services or functions. It seems apparent that where, as in the case of the Special Services Charges Orders⁵, an Act allows the Governor in Council to fix fees, an order can be made under section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act empowering the Minister to fix those fees instead.

10. The Postmaster General has advised that he is satisfied that the authority vested in him by the Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order to set at naught the expressed will of Parliament in sections 10 and 11 of the Post Office Act is clear; that section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act can not be confined to a service provided to one person only; that once that individual limitation is removed the number of individuals to whom a service is provided (and impliedly their identification) is irrelevant; that Parliament specifically enacted section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act so that the power could be used to levy higher charges notwithstanding any Act of Parliament that fixed a level of charges.

11. Your Committee finds that the Postmaster General's interpretation produces very strange results. It reduces to this: that if in conformity with any Act a fee is to be set, then the Governor in Council must set his mind and hand to the task under section 13(a) of the Financial Administration Act, but if a fee is to be set in abrogation of a statutory scale the task can, under section 13(b) be given to and performed by a single Minister. For the reasons given in the preceding sections of this Statement, your Committee considers it at least doubtful that section 13 lends itself to this curious result.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 12, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

May 12, 1977

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Jean Beetz, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 12th day of May, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Auditors' report to Parliament on the accounts of the Canadian National Railway System for the year ended December 31, 1976, pursuant to section 40 of the Canadian National Railways Act, Chapter C-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Public Service Commission of Canada for the year ended December 31, 1976, pursuant to section 45 of the Public Service Employment Act, Chapter P-32, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Public Service Commission on Positions or Persons excluded from the operation of the Public Service Employment Act for the year ended December 31, 1976, pursuant to section 45 of the said Act, Chapter P-32, R.S.C., 1970.

NATIONAL UNITY

REGIONAL ASPIRATIONS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, May 17, I will call the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

May I say a word of explanation, honourable senators? Concern for the future of Canada and for the future shape of Confederation is not restricted to any one section or corner of this chamber, or indeed in the other place or in any legislative assembly in this country. Hopefully, this inquiry will afford further opportunities for honourable senators to express their views on the important subject of national unity and regional aspirations, and how concerns in both areas can be met more effectively.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 17, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

● (1410)

Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to give you a brief summary of the work for next week. Of course, as you know, the picture could change considerably by the time we return on Tuesday evening. I shall deal first with the committees.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has scheduled a meeting for 2.30 on Tuesday afternoon to consider the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

On Wednesday at 9.30 a.m. there will be a meeting in camera of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the white paper on banking legislation. Also on Wednesday, either at 3.30 p.m. or when the Senate rises, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet to deal with the 1977-78 main estimates, and there will also be a meeting of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy.

On Thursday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to hear witnesses on the white paper on banking; the National Finance Committee will meet at the same time to deal with the estimates of the Department of Public Works, and the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 a.m.

In the Senate itself we shall continue with the second reading debate on Bill C-41, Bill C-9, Bill C-39, and other items on the order paper. In addition to that we may have one or two bills from the other place as well as a bill for introduction in this chamber.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Hastings be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Argue on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

THE ENVIRONMENT

PROTECTION OF COASTAL WATERS AND SHORELINES FROM OIL POLLUTION—QUESTION

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in this house.

In view of the fact that within a month giant oil tankers will be bringing Prudhoe Bay oil from Valdez through Canadian territorial waters, and in view of the fact that the oil companies have publicly announced that they do not deem it economic to take such precautions as having double bottoms on such ships, and in view of the fact that the Americans, as a result of two very damaging ecological disasters on their own east coast, have strengthened their laws with respect to territorial control of oil tankers, could the Honourable Leader of the Government inform the Senate whether the Government of Canada has made orders in the Department of Transport or otherwise to govern the travel of these ships through Canadian waters and to safeguard to the best possible degree the delicate and wonderful shorelines of the sovereign and great province of British Columbia?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, admittedly, that is a most important question, whether it relates to the west coast, to the east coast or to any of Canada's coasts. It is my understanding that if giant tankers carrying oil do travel from Valdez to some American port they will in fact travel in international waters. However, apart from that, it may well be that the dangers to Canada's coastline would continue to exist.

Because of the importance of the question, I will take it as notice and present a fuller statement to the Senate.

Senator Grosart: Could I ask a supplementary question in view of the obvious difference in the terminology between the question and the answer? Where the question used the term "territorial waters," the Leader of the Government was careful, I think, to use the term "international waters," making the question very different from the terminology in which it was put. Would the Leader of the Government include in his answer the official Canadian definition at the present time of "territorial waters"?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, my understanding is that Canada's territorial waters extend to 12 miles. Our economic zone goes to 200 miles. However, I shall certainly attempt to clarify the terminology when I give a more complete reply.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Would the Leader of the Government be kind enough, when investigating this particular question, to investigate also whether there is any technical difference between the terms "territorial waters" and "territorial sea"?

Senator Perrault: I understand that there is no difference as far as the jurisdiction of Canada is concerned, but I will attempt to clarify that matter also.

Senator Williams: I have a question for the Leader of the Government further to that of Senator Greene with respect to the matter of vessels that will be plying the coast of British Columbia. The risk of danger caused by these giant oil tankers will apply particularly in the area of Juan de Fuca Strait, where there are at times nearly 2,000 commercial fishing vessels operating. In seeking the answer to the question, will he please give consideration to the safety aspect of this?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will attempt to include a reply to that question in the reply to the original question posed by the Honourable Senator Greene.

TRANSPORTATION

FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN NORTH SYDNEY, NOVA SCOTIA, AND PORT-AUX-BASQUES, NEWFOUNDLAND—QUESTION

Senator Duggan: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, as follows:

1. Can the Leader of the Government advise whether it is necessary to have a reservation to sail to Newfoundland via CN Marine ferries during the tourist season of 1977?

2. If the answer to question No. 1 is "yes," was approval for this change of policy granted by the Canadian Transport Commission to the CN Marine operating ferry service between North Sydney, Nova Scotia, and Port-aux-Basques, Newfoundland?

3. If the answer to question No. 2 is "yes," did the Canadian Transport Commission hold a hearing so that the travelling public could have an opportunity to object?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF CANADA

ORIGINAL PAINTINGS—QUESTION

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question. Would the leader obtain for this house the following information:

1. How many original paintings are owned by the National Gallery of Canada?

2. Now many of those paintings are being presently exhibited at the premises of the National Gallery?

3. How many of those paintings are presently being exhibited or hung in other federal government premises?

4. How many of those paintings are presently being exhibited in places other than the National Gallery or federal government premises?

5. How many of those paintings are presently not being exhibited or hung anywhere?

6. How many of those paintings are presently being restored or are awaiting restoration?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I regret that I do not have that information immediately available—

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: —but I will take the question as notice.

Senator Grosart: As a supplementary, would the leader also obtain information as to how many paintings owned by the National Gallery are lost or unaccounted for?

Senator Buckwold: Some of them should be lost.

PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS MONITORING BILL

FIRST READING

Senator Perrault presented Bill S-4, to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada.

Bill read first time.

● (1420)

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, before proceeding with the Orders of the Day, may I be allowed to call the attention of Madam Speaker, and all of you, to the presence in the gallery of distinguished visitors from Upper Volta, Mr. Abdulaye Dicko and his wife. Their visit is of particular importance with regard to relations between Canada and Upper Volta.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ENTITLEMENTS ADJUSTMENT BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved third reading of Bill C-52, to provide for the consideration of certain unemployment insurance entitlements.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, when the Deputy Leader of the Government introduced this bill yesterday, in referring to claims made under certain provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971, he said, as reported at page 688 of Hansard:

As of January 4, 1976, all claims were terminated for those persons 65 years of age and over who were already receiving benefits, and that affected approximately 17,000 claimants. Similarly, as of that same date, all claimants receiving the dependency rate of 75 per cent were reduced to the general rate of 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent, and that affected approximately 176,000 claimants.

Later, on the same page, he said:

I would also mention that arrangements are now being made to have royal assent late tomorrow afternoon to two other bills, and if this bill were assented to at that time I think it would be of some help to those claimants who have been waiting now since January 4, 1976, for these adjustments to their retirement benefits.

I wish to put on the record the fact that this bill was extracted, unless I am mistaken, from section 48 of Bill C-27, which received first reading on December 9, 1976. It was part of a bill entitled:

An Act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof.

This bill has been before the other place for some time, and I feel confident in saying that the government, by delaying the passage of this very important bill, amending a number of other bills in a substantial manner, is preventing 17,000 persons in one class and 176,000 in another from receiving their benefits.

The government was using that argument to push the passage of Bill C-27. Then it finally donned on them that if they really wanted to help these claimants they could extract this provision from Bill C-27 and use it to formulate a separate bill to remedy the problem. That is how it came about that Bill C-52 was introduced and received quick passage in the other place.

The government had been aware of this problem for quite some time. The blame for any delay in remedying it certainly should not be attributed to the House of Commons or to any party in that chamber. It must be attributed to the stubbornness of the government in refusing to formulate a special bill.

We were pleased to adopt the motion for the second reading of this bill yesterday and to consent to its passage today without the necessity of its being referred to committee. I repeat, neither house of Parliament can be blamed for any delay in the settlement of the claims in question; the blame rests solely with the government.

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Flynn: Of course. From you, always.

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator not agree that had his party in the other place not obstructed the omnibus bill in its passage, this whole matter would have been settled earlier in the year?

Senator Flynn: Surely, I didn't understand the question. Are you suggesting that if we had passed the omnibus bill without looking at it, the problem would have been solved?

Senator Greene: Had they voted on it responsibly after due debate instead of obstructing its passage in total, this step would not have been necessary.

Senator Flynn: We obstructed passage of the omnibus bill for the simple reason that there were a lot of other problems. The government was blackmailing Parliament by saying, in effect, that if Parliament did not pass the whole bill those poor people would not get what they were entitled to. That is a vicious device and one which has been used too often by the present government.

Senator Greene: I notice that the honourable senator very honestly, as is his way, used the words "we obstructed," for which I thank him.

Senator Flynn: All "obstruction" means is to block. That is the role of the opposition: to block bad legislation while seeking to improve it. I would have thought that Senator Greene would be aware of such an elementary point.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, when the Leader of the Opposition put this question to me yesterday he referred to the provisions of Bill C-52 as having been extracted from a bill currently before the other place. Because I was unable to ascertain to which bill my honourable friend was referring, I was unable to reply to the question. However, in looking into this matter further I discovered that there are currently three bills respecting unemployment insurance before the other place, and those are: Bill C-400, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (benefits to adopting parent); Bill C-403, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (disentitlement by age or pension); and, Bill C-27, which is the bill to which my honourable friend alluded a few moments ago.

However, as I told my honourable friend before coming into the chamber, it is impossible to find in Bill C-27 provisions similar to those included in Bill C-52. So, when he makes the statement that these provisions were extracted from another bill which was delayed in the other place, he is not putting the facts properly before this house. It is very easy to blame the government for all delays in the other place. The government, however, is not the only party playing a role there. To my mind, it is not appropriate for honourable members of this chamber to criticize the manner in which the other place conducts its own business.

Senator Flynn: But you did.

Senator Langlois: I am not saying that at all. I am not criticizing. I am simply putting the facts before this chamber as should have been done by my honourable friend, who failed to do so to serve his own ends.

Senator Flynn: Well, what in your view are my own ends?

Senator Langlois: To find reason for criticism of the government where there is none.

Senator Flynn: I am sure my honourable friend will realize that I did not criticize him yesterday for not knowing the answer to a very simple and straightforward question concerning this bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Langlois: Again, my honourable friend cannot take it sitting down.

● (1430)

I think I have answered the question raised by Senator Flynn quite adequately, and I shall now return to the questions asked yesterday by Senator Phillips. I have already answered his first question. His second question had to do with the benefits of those who have died in the meantime—that is, since January 4, 1976. My reply yesterday—although I gave it under the reservation that I had not checked this particular aspect of the bill with the department—was that benefits acquired before the death of these beneficiaries would be paid to their estates. I received confirmation this morning from the deputy minister that my answer was quite correct.

The other question Senator Phillips asked and which I could not answer yesterday because I had not considered the point—and I admitted this quite frankly—was as to whether or not interest would be paid to the beneficiaries who were entitled to these adjustments during that period from January 4, 1976 to the date of payment of adjustment. I was told that it has never been the practice for the Unemployment Insurance Commission to pay interest on claims of this nature. When a claim is refused, or is referred to a board of referees, and payment is made after a certain delay, there is no interest paid on that payment. The deputy minister told me this morning, and I agree with his position, that there is no authority in the bill presently before us to authorize the Unemployment Insurance Commission to pay interest on any of these claims.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I would just comment on the statement made by the deputy leader. He has made such a statement before on similar occasions in respect to the criticisms from the Leader of the Opposition. It is generally to the effect that it is not in order to criticize in this chamber the conduct of business in the other chamber. I agree with this, but only if the criticism is of the House of Commons. I point out that Senator Flynn's criticism on this occasion, and on many others, has been of the government and what the government does in the House of Commons, which is a very different thing.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MARITIME CODE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Cook moved the second reading of Bill C-41, to provide a maritime code for Canada and to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, the duty of explaining the provisions of Bill C-41, the Maritime Code, affords me the opportunity to pay a brief tribute to one of our most senior and honoured members who has been for so long closely involved with Canadian shipping.

I refer to my desk-mate, Senator Norman Paterson, who is Canada's foremost ship owner and operator. Fifty years ago he founded N. M. Paterson and Son. During the past 20 years, this family firm has had constructed in Canada 20 ships for its own operations, which makes it one of the largest ship owners in Canada, if not the largest. It operates a fleet of 20 ships, all Canadian-built, with a total tonnage exceeding 100,000 tons.

Senator Paterson's fleet operates not only in the Great Lakes, but also in the Atlantic Ocean down to the West Indies. To mark its fiftieth year of operation, the firm has had built at Collingwood yet another ship, which was launched last June. I am sure all senators wish this truly Canadian firm, founded by a great Canadian, all the very best success in the years to come.

Honourable senators, as we commence our consideration of Bill C-41, it is interesting to note that in 1875, more than 100 years ago, the British Parliament passed into law the Unseaworthy Ships Act, one of the earlier pieces of British maritime legislation, which required that ships be marked with load lines, to limit the depth to which they could be loaded and to allow for a safe margin of freeboard.

This important measure was the result of nearly four years of courageous effort on the part of Samuel Plimsoll, a member of the British House of Commons. Appalled by the tragic loss of literally thousands of ships, he conducted a determined campaign on behalf of seamen, despite strenuous opposition. The result was the load lines that we see on both sides of our ships today, still often referred to as "Plimsoll marks".

Today, one century later, we find ourselves about to examine a far-reaching revision of our own maritime law. Up to now the Canada Shipping Act has been the major text of law governing shipping and navigation in our waters. The Canada Shipping Act was substantially based on the British Merchant Shipping Act, and both our act and the parent act have been extensively revised over the years.

Though the Canada Shipping Act has served us well in the past, and is still valid today, it has become awkward and out of date. In recent years, inquiries conducted in Canada and in Britain recommended extensive revisions of the respective acts. It was then felt that the old act would not survive another refit, and that it should be replaced with brand new legislation, which would consolidate other acts governing Canadian shipping.

Work started in 1968, and it was decided to replace the act and related statutes with a number of books of law. The first two books, dealing with general matters and the ship, are now before us today as part of Bill C-41, the Maritime Code Bill. Books to follow will enunciate the law on crew standards, cargo, cargo safety, and operational standards.

As a result of this on-going work the former Minister of Transport introduced Bill C-61 in the House of Commons in May 1975. That bill was thoroughly scrutinized by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transportation and Communications, which reported to the House of Commons the results of its study. The legislation has been reintroduced in this session of Parliament as Bill C-41.

In presenting Bill C-41, it may be useful to summarize briefly how the Maritime Code Act is structured, and review a few of its major provisions.

The bill consists of the Maritime Code Act and three schedules, establishing the code itself as Schedule III to the bill, thereby providing a vehicle for the phasing out of the Canada Shipping Act and the phasing in of the Maritime Code.

The first two schedules merely list all the various other acts that are affected by the coming into force of this new legislation, together with the changes which will be made in those statutes. Schedule III is the Maritime Code proper, and it is designed to contain all the books of substantive law in shipping matters that will eventually replace the Canada Shipping Act and related statutes.

At this initial legislative stage Schedule III contains two such books, namely, Book I—General, and Book II—The Ship. It is envisaged that eventually there will be five such books, although the number of books is flexible, and may be increased if warranted by future necessity. As each of the 21 parts of the existing Canada Shipping Act, which are not yet repealed, is reviewed and revised, it will be transferred to the Maritime Code and placed into the appropriate book in Schedule III.

Book I establishes the applicability of the Maritime Code and provides for Canadian law to be extended to Canadian ships in foreign waters, and to foreign ships in Canadian waters.

In order to allow for greater public participation in the regulation-making process, provision is made for prior publication of regulations in certain specified cases and, at the minister's discretion, for public hearings.

The enforcement provisions contained in Book I have been revised substantially in comparison with those in the Canada Shipping Act. Matters related to the detention of ships have been expanded and clarified.

With respect to enforcement, the procedures relating to offences, penalties and fines have been clarified and coordinated, where necessary, with provisions of the Criminal Code. A new procedure for the service of a summons in the form of a ticket and for payment of fines by mail in the case of minor offences has been instituted.

Matters related to the detention of ships have been expanded and clarified. Arrest in civil cases has been extended to sister ships to conform with international practice, and the procedures relating to forfeiture have been set out in detail.

Turning now to Book II, its main provisions are intended to deal with the ship as a structure. In this respect, provisions concerning the national character and status of a ship have been clarified and related to Canadian registration. It is worth mentioning that under existing law, Canadian ships are British ships registered in Canada. The effect of this bill is to establish a distinct Canadian registry of shipping, and to divorce Canadian registry from British registry.

The ownership provisions of the Canada Shipping Act have been substantially changed. The primary purpose of these provisions is not to control foreign investment in Canadian shipping companies, but rather to ensure that there will always be responsible persons within Canada to answer for the actions of a Canadian ship outside Canada.

Another highlight of the code will create a centralized registry system for all Canadian vessels. The existing licensing system for smaller vessels will be eliminated, and the new registration system will provide a true title registry for vessels of all sizes. Essentially, the centralization process is designed to facilitate an effective, reliable and universal registration system, but the filing of documents can continue to take place at a regional level. In this way the best features of both the central and local registry systems will be retained.

The provisions relating to the measurement of ships have been considerably improved to take into account both the metric system and the new international rules relating to measurement of tonnage.

The bill provides for a gradual transition from the old legislation. The study program for the revision and re-organization of shipping law is on-going, and this method of revision is the most suitable as it provides a better opportunity for informed comment and debate. Each stage of legislation necessary to complete the Maritime Code will go before Parliament in the usual way so that Parliament will have full opportunity to consider the relationships between the general and the specific provisions on each occasion.

In the future, if amendments to the Maritime Code are deemed desirable, they will be considered in the light of prevailing circumstances and such amendments would present no technical difficulty.

It is the government's policy to create the necessary legislative support to give Canada a strong marine infrastructure. We are busy developing new policy options in the field of international shipping. The administrative structures of our ports are being streamlined and standardized. We are moving ahead with the construction of a Canadian ice-breaking bulk carrier for operation in the Arctic, and we are engaged with the industry and the provinces in improving our training techniques and facilities for ships' crews.

In Bill C-41 we are giving ourselves a modern tool with which to meet adequately and successfully the challenges of today's complex marine world, a tool that will allow us to exercise control over shipping activities in Canada and to continue our participation with international bodies in the formulation of safer regulations for navigation on the high seas.

Honourable senators, should this bill receive second reading in due course, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, for the usual detailed and careful study which is the hallmark of that committee's work.

On motion of Senator Smith (Colchester), debate adjourned.
The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

IMPLEMENTATION OF HELSINKI AGREEMENT—QUESTION

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Honourable Leader of the Government.

In view of the pending June Belgrade conference to review the progress in the implementation of the Helsinki Agreement, what organization has been established by the government to detail such progress in Canada?

Specifically with reference to Basket III of the Agreement, what organization is to gather the required information?

Is such organization, if established, requesting reports on progress from the various Canadian national ethnic organizations from all Communist countries in Europe?

Specifically, what are the numbers on both re-unification of families and individual emigration to Canada during the two years prior to the signing of the Helsinki Agreement and each year since, listed respectively from each Communist country in eastern Europe?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice.

Senator Flynn: For two reasons.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have just had some disquieting information given to me, and I must give that as a reason for my hesitancy in replying.

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING NUCLEAR SUPPLIES—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government if it is his intention to give a fairly immediate reply to the question I asked about the negotiations regarding certain Canadian nuclear contracts with certain other countries.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only take that inquiry, again, as notice. I believe it deserves a full response, which I hope to make within a few days.

BANK ACT QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macnaughton, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-39, intituled: "An Act to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act".—(Honourable Senator Benidickson, P.C.).

Senator Petten: Stand.

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, this item has been on the order paper for several days now, having been postponed at the request of one honourable senator. This is a very small bill. I do not wish to push the matter, but surely we could proceed on May 19, at least.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I would point out that the senator in whose name this order stands is ill this evening. He assured me, however, that he will proceed with it tomorrow.

Senator Macnaughton: Well, I would like to suggest that we proceed with it on May 19, since it is impossible for me to be here tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Shall this matter then be adjourned until May 19?

Senator Petten: No, honourable senators, I am sorry. The senator in whose name this is adjourned has assured me he will speak to it tomorrow, and it can be concluded on May 19; or do I misunderstand you, Senator Macnaughton?

Senator Macnaughton: No. That is all right.

Senator Flynn: It is not an order of the Senate that this debate should be concluded on May 19?

Senator Petten: No.

VISIT OF DELEGATION OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS TO MEXICO, MARCH 21 TO 28, 1977—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat rose pursuant to notice of April 28:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the visit of a delegation of Canadian parliamentarians to Mexico, from 21st to 28th March, 1977.

He said: Honourable senators, before I proceed I would ask permission of the Senate to have the joint communiqué issued by the Canadian parliamentary delegation which visited Mexico from March 21 to March 28, 1977 printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of joint communiqué see Appendix, p. 713.)

Senator Molgat: Thank you, honourable senators, for that privilege. The communiqué gives details of the activities of this delegation, and I am sure it will be of interest.

At the outset I would say I was pleased and honoured to be selected as a member of the delegation, and as the co-leader of the delegation representing the Senate. I was accompanied by two of my honourable and very friendly colleagues, Honourable Senator Bélisle and Honourable Senator Bonnell, and their gracious ladies. There were also representatives from the House of Commons, whom I shall mention later.

Before I say anything else, I want to express—and I am sure I am doing this for all members of the delegation—our warmest thanks to the members of both houses of the Mexican Parliament; in fact to all of the Mexican people we had occasion to meet during our trip. We could not have been received in a more friendly, open and helpful manner. I really cannot find the words to describe the reception accorded our delegation. It was as a direct result of it that we had a most fruitful week's discussion with the people of Mexico.

Perhaps a bit about the history of our association with Mexico might be useful at this point. Though our diplomatic relations with Mexico go back to 1944, it was not until fairly recently that parliamentary associations developed. There have been other meetings. For example, there was the visit to Canada in 1973 of the then President of Mexico, President Echeverria, who addressed the joint houses, and the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable Muriel Fergusson, responded for both houses. There was a visit to Mexico in January 1976 by the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau, and there have been meetings of ministers and deputy ministers on a regular basis over the past four or five years. However, it was not until 1975 that the first parliamentary meeting took place between Mexico and Canada, and here we have to express our thanks to the Parliament of Mexico, who took the initiative and in January 1975 invited Canadian parliamentarians for the first official visit to Mexico. At that time the leader of the delegation was the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Honourable James Jerome, and the Senate was represented by three senators, including the Speaker, the Honourable Muriel Fergusson.

That fruitful meeting was followed in March 1976 by a visit to Canada by a Mexican delegation composed of 11 parliamentarians, five from the Senate and six from the Chamber of Deputies. They visited parts of our country but not, to my particular regret, western Canada. At least, they saw some parts of Canada, and then continued the meetings in Ottawa.

This Canadian delegation, which was in Mexico from March 21 to 28 of this year, took part in the third official parliamentary meeting between Canadians and Mexicans.

It is always risky to mention particular persons when expressing thanks, but I must name some. The President of the Great Commission of the Chamber of Deputies of Mexico, Representative Augusto Gomez Villanueva, chaired the majority of the meetings, and throughout was of great assistance to us. The co-chairman from the Mexican Senate was Senator Joaquin Gamboa Pascoe who participated in all the meetings and received us in the Senate chamber for a visit there, as well as at a reception and lunch.

In addition, there was a special reception for both delegations given by the newly elected President of Mexico, José Lopez Portillo, in the Presidential Palace. The President spoke to us, and expressed his great interest in closer relationships with Canada. The co-chairman of the Canadian delegation from the House of Commons, the chief government whip, Mr. Gus MacFarlane, was chosen to respond on that day on behalf of Canada, and to repeat, on behalf of the delegation and the Canadian people, an invitation which had been extended previously by Prime Minister Trudeau to the new President to visit Canada. It is our hope that he will—he certainly expressed the desire to—respond to that invitation and come to Canada at an early date.

Our thanks are extended as well to all of the people with whom we dealt—the driver of the bus, the hostesses who guided us around and all the people we met, who consistently went out of their way to help us, to assist our travels and to make life pleasant for us, and who gave us a fine view of Mexico and the Mexican people.

On this visit most of the delegates were accompanied by their wives—at, I might add for the record, the delegates' own expense. This permitted a different kind of discussion on many occasions. The conversations and relationships at dinners and luncheons provided a more varied view than would have been possible had there been only parliamentarians present. I think I can say justly that the breakfast, lunch and dinner meetings—and I might add that the Mexican group, with their great hospitality, had daily breakfasts, luncheons and dinners, where we had the opportunity to meet the delegates and other members of both houses and their wives—while not exactly working occasions were nevertheless useful occasions on which to transmit knowledge from one group to the other. So the entire program, while in some ways heavily loaded from a time standpoint, in my opinion, was very useful to both groups.

I would also be remiss if I did not express the thanks of our delegation to those here in Canada who assisted in the preparation for the trip. I refer particularly to Mr. Peter Dobell, Director, Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs, and his staff, and representatives of the Department of External Affairs who briefed us thoroughly prior to our departure. This enabled us to be in a position to speak, if not as experts then at least knowledgeably, with respect to the problems which we were expected to discuss.

Once we were in Mexico, the Canadian Ambassador, His Excellency James Langley, and his staff, and Mrs. Langley, were of constant help to us.

Senator Grosart: They were wonderful.

Senator Molgat: Yes, they certainly were, and anyone who has been on this kind of visit, I believe, appreciates the help which is extended by the Department of External Affairs and, in particular, by the ambassador on location. As a result of those briefings, we were in a much better position to have useful discussions with the Mexican delegation.

The delegation which represented Canada had a particular flavour, to which I would like to make reference because it was really representative of every part of the country. From the Senate we had representatives from the Maritimes, Ontario and Manitoba. From the House of Commons we had an equally distributed delegation, with representatives from Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories. It is rare to find that kind of geographical distribution. Equally interesting, as it turned out, was the ethnic representation. It was really, in a sense, a small Canada on tour, because we had represented virtually every one of the ethnic groups which make up this country. I believe this was of special interest to the Mexican delegation.

Every member of our delegation gave the utmost cooperation. Each member participated not only in the discussions on the agenda subjects but, in addition, at each of the official functions one member of the delegation was chosen to officially represent the Canadian delegation. For example, Senator Bélisle was the official spokesman for Canada at the reception and dinner held by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Senator Choquette: Did he speak Spanish or French?

Senator Molgat: He, as a matter of fact, spoke both French and Spanish—and English.

Senator Choquette: Good.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molgat: Senator Bonnell was the official spokesman for the delegation at the reception and lunch held by the President of the Senate of Mexico in the Senate chambers. Various representatives spoke for the delegation throughout our visit.

● (2030)

After the official meetings in Mexico City, we were given the opportunity to see other parts of Mexico. We met with the Governors of four of the Mexican states, the States of Chiapas, Quintana Roo, Yucatan, and Tabasco. In each case, the reception was overwhelming. Visits to some of the Mayan and Aztec ruins provided us with an opportunity to understand some of the history of Mexico. They provided us with an opportunity to appreciate the long history of that country; to appreciate the struggles through which it went in order to achieve its present high degree of development.

The subjects discussed are listed in the communiqué I mentioned at the outset of my remarks, but I will go over them briefly. They dealt with trade, tourism, exchange of workers, exchange of students, the question of fisheries—all subjects with which our two countries have a joint concern. What impressed our delegation most throughout the discussions was the keen desire on the part of the Mexican parliamentarians to work more closely with Canada. We have a golden opportunity for a fruitful association for both countries. In many respects, our countries have great similarities.

It is true that in certain areas the Mexican delegation made very clear their desire for greater trade with Canada; their feeling that there is an imbalance at this juncture; and that they are, in fact, buying a great deal more from us than we are buying from them. While the raw figures may indicate that that is so, there are, of course, some counterbalancing factors. For example, in the tourist industry Canadians spend a great deal more in Mexico than Mexicans spend in Canada. There is the fact that in respect of much of the trade, particularly in fruits and vegetables, many of the products coming to Canada are sent through American brokers and do not appear as a Canadian purchases. Such products are merely in transit through U.S. brokers. These facts were brought to their attention.

The discussions provided both delegations with the opportunity to explain to each other the conditions as they view them. Through it all there came a very clear desire on the part of the Mexican delegation for closer relations with Canada. The Mexican people are looking more and more towards a North American relationship, and as evidence of that we have meetings such as I am now talking of, the exchange visits by Prime Ministers and Presidents, and the new attitude taken by President Carter. All of these developments provide an opportunity for new approaches on the North American continent. I do not suggest that such a relationship should be at the expense of Mexico's ties with Latin America. However, I do feel that those ties can be maintained while pursuing a closer relationship with Canada.

We share the same continent; we share the same relationship with the most powerful country on earth. It is a friendly country, but nevertheless the relationship is one where obviously frictions can develop. But I think that by working together with the Mexican people we can help each other's position and strengthen the whole of the North American structure. It is by communication and more discussion that we can achieve this.

In the past, the attitude of Mexico towards the United States has probably been somewhat different from our own. This is understandable when one looks at the history of the country. But I think now there is an opportunity for a new attitude. The Canadian government, the Canadian people and Canadian companies should be looking at this opportunity for much closer cooperation with Mexico. They are in need in many areas of capital; they are in need in many areas of expertise. I think we are in a position to supply some of these needs. It is true that we have our own capital needs, and those of us who come from other than central Canada often feel that we are in need of capital development as well. However, if we look at the long-range situation in North America, and in the world, we will find that there are sound reasons for Canadian cooperation with Mexico in development.

It is true that under the laws of Mexico they insist on maintaining control through holding a minimum of 51 per cent of any industry that is developed within Mexico. They have brought in this provision consciously because they want to maintain control of their economy. But I still believe, while recognizing that Mexican law, that there is an opportunity for Canadian cooperation, for example, in the field of mining where we have the technology; in forestry where we have years of experience and where we have trained people; in fisheries where we fish in the same oceans; and in agriculture where we also have highly developed expertise in certain crops. By cooperating with the Mexican people at this time, we will be improving not only their position but our own as well.

If we fail to take this opportunity now, honourable senators, then it will be taken by others. I am not being in any way critical of investors, be they from Japan, West Germany, France, Great Britain or elsewhere, but the opportunity is there. Mexico is in need of development. It has a large labour force, much of which is underemployed. It still has large areas that are underdeveloped. It has a demand for finance and for expertise. If we are prepared to cooperate at this time and to work with them, I think that in the long run it will be to our own benefit. We will be ensuring a long-range position for Canada, which is there waiting for us. If we do not move, then I think others will.

Honourable senators, I want to close by simply thanking my colleagues in this chamber who were on the delegation with me, and my co-leader and the delegates from the House of Commons. It was a good delegation. We worked well together. Everyone participated, and everyone cooperated. I think the work we did during that week in Mexico was useful for both chambers of Parliament, was useful for Canada, and will, I hope, help to promote better understanding not only between Mexico and Canada but among all the nations of the world.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL UNITY

REGIONAL ASPIRATIONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault rose pursuant to notice of May 12:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, in speaking to this inquiry, I know that most members of this chamber welcome this opportunity to discuss the ways in which Canada can meet more effectively the economic, cultural and political challenges which present themselves at this time, as well as the opportunity to discuss the aspirations of the various regions of this nation. There has been a good deal of comment both within and outside Parliament about the need to have this matter discussed in both chambers of Parliament. I therefore welcome the opportunity to initiate a debate which I feel will be useful for the nation.

As I stated last Thursday, concern for the future of Canada and for the future shape of Confederation is not restricted to any one section or corner of this chamber; it is not restricted to any one political party; to any one personality; or, indeed, to the other place or to any legislative chamber in this country or to any one province. There is concern throughout Canada about the future of this nation. There are few areas of complacency left in Canada as from coast to coast more Canadians ponder the future. There is a growing realization that this process, the end goal of which is to keep Canada united and strong, must not be a spectator process but must be a process of participation by not only those who serve in the elected assemblies of this country but by every citizen.

The inquiry before us is worded so that honourable senators can engage in a wide-ranging look at Confederation. That includes, of course, regional disparities, national unity and the aspirations of the regions. Surely, the Senate is an appropriate parliamentary chamber in which to launch such a debate. Senators will not need to be reminded of the historical roots of this place, for the Senate was established largely in response to appeals and requests from certain smaller provinces, which felt that a second chamber should be established to protect regional interests and aspirations. The Senate came into being in part to better articulate the needs, the desires and the problems of the regions of Canada. Surely, we senators have a unique responsibility at this time in the history of our nation. The Senate was to be a counterbalance against the possible misuse of power by a Commons selected by the overwhelming population majorities of central Canada. It is appropriate, then, that the national parliamentary dialogue about regional aspirations, disparities and unity should involve members of this chamber, and, indeed, be initiated in this chamber. It is also appropriate that this discussion in our chamber should coincide with the happy fact that all of the provinces of Canada and its territories are now represented in this chamber. Together with you I look forward to the contributions which will be made by this substantial cross-section of our nation. I feel sure that the contributions to come will be as distinctive and as challenging as the various areas of Canada themselves.

It is true that there may be some Canadians, even in the Parliament of Canada, either in the Senate or in the other place, who believe there is danger in a debate of this kind; who believe that the airing of painful problems, the articulation of differences and conflicts of opinion, can be self-defeating.

The events of November 15 last have in part prompted this inquiry. But the events in one province should not obscure from us our need to examine the question of how all of the regions of Canada fit within Confederation.

On April 18 the Prime Minister said that the challenges of our nationhood involved great dangers, but also great hopes—hopes, I suggest, for all Canadians in all of our provinces. One of our esteemed colleagues said bluntly in the chamber last week that we should mind our own business, that only the people of Quebec can decide what will happen there. With due deference to that viewpoint, however, most Canadians are concerned about national unity, whether it is threatened in the east, the west, in central Canada or in the Atlantic provinces.

In over 110 years we have come to develop a family interest in the nation's problems, and we have developed a family concern about challenges, wherever they may present themselves and whatever the circumstances. It would be unrealistic, I think, to assume that Canadians of any one province would allow themselves to be shunted to the sidelines in any situation involving the unity of the nation.

There are indications, and we have been told this a number of times, that our fellow citizens from Quebec will vote to remain as Canadians should a referendum be held. But surely such a favourable vote would be a pyrrhic victory, unless the root cause of the call for separatism, even by a minority, were examined and, hopefully, eliminated. Similarly, in western Canada, while the small vocal minority advocating western separatism may be crushed politically, nevertheless, alleged grievances should be studied in order to determine whether they actually exist—just as the historical claims of Canadians from the Atlantic provinces deserve the same kind of careful study and consideration at this time in our history.

The cause of federalism in Quebec, the cause of federalism in the west, the east, the maritimes and Newfoundland—any part of Canada—will not be served by ignoring the fact that Canadians, who internationally are regarded as generous, considerate and compassionate people, can occasionally act spitefully and unthinkingly toward their own. If we have learned one truth in our 110 years of existence, it is that our vast distances, our regional interests, our great, rich, varied ethnic background demand a vast measure of tolerance, understanding and patience on the part of all of us.

Speaking of distance, honourable senators may be aware of the fact that geographically the province of British Columbia is located closer to the Soviet Union than it is to Ottawa; the province of Newfoundland is closer to Britain than it is to Vancouver. This vast geographical expanse poses enormous challenges to our qualities as citizens. It asks us to be perhaps more understanding, tolerant and patient than most other nations in the world.

André Siegfried, in one of his works which I remember reading at university, wrote of the "seven Canadas", the seven geographical areas of our nation, and how we have defied all geographical logic to bring Canada into existence when all of our geographical features run north and south.

As well, we have overcome mountains of other differences in order to bring into being a nation. By any political and economic law or theorem, perhaps we should not have been able to become a nation in the first place. But here we are, a successful nation after 110 years of existence. Honourable senators, Canada's progress can be compared favourably with any other nation in the world over a similar period of time.

There are some myths about our nation, and parliamentarians are more aware of these myths, perhaps, than many other people who are not given the opportunity to travel around the country; particularly the simplistic myth that there are only two Canadas; the myth that there is a monolithic linguistic ethnic bloc known as "French Canada" centred somewhere in Montreal. And there are those who are not quite sure where Montreal is located in the province of Quebec. Then there is that other myth—the notion of another monolithic linguistic ethnic bloc known as "English Canada" centred in Toronto.

Well, both concepts are incorrect. Those who know so-called French Canada know that it is a richly varied landscape of peoples, talents, abilities and resources. More Canadians should be reminded of the fact that those Canadians who live in Quebec are descended almost entirely from 65,000 French from the western departments of France who were abandoned on the banks of the St. Lawrence by the Treaty of Paris in 1763. Cut off from contacts with France, from which they received no further reinforcements, their only hope of survival lay in their own incredible vitality. The millions of Canadians of French descent have written in the new world an astonishing page of history by any standard. Yet I wonder if this fact is totally understood or appreciated by many people in this country.

I was looking at some quotations the other day and I came across one by Voltaire. In a letter to France dated October 3, 1760, he said:

If only I dared, I would implore you on my knees—

He was writing to a prominent figure in the Government of France.

—to rid France for ever from the administration of Canada. By losing Canada, you lose nothing; if you want her restored to you, you restore a perpetual source of war and humiliation . . . no more.

Later he said:

Canada is a few acres of snow and not worth a soldier's bones.

Thank heaven that the 65,000 tough, resilient and vital people of French descent did not heed that dire warning of Voltaire.

Not only did they survive, but today they are writing more astonishing pages.

Who can read history and not be reminded of the fact that when Benjamin Franklin and others came to the province of Quebec from the United States and asked for the support of Canadians of French descent in the war against Britain and an American conquest of Canada, Canadians of French descent stood by Canada and refused to join in the American invasion of this country? Indeed, there would not be a Canada today had it not been for that opposition recorded in this one historical episode in the life of this country. Yet some still regard Quebec as inaccurately as Hollywood often depicts Canada: made up mostly of ice and snow, trappers, hockey players, and Mounties bursting into song at frequent intervals.

On the other side of the coin there is the stereotype of English Canada, the image of Bay Street and economic domination, and a group of people passionately dedicated to preserving nothing at all except links with London. That image is just as inaccurate. It ignores the immense and varied contribution of those whose ancestors came to Canada from the United Kingdom.

In fact, Canada is a nation of minorities. There is no such thing as an "English" monolith majority or a "French" monolith majority. For example, English-speaking Canada is made up of hundreds of minorities, sharing in common the English language spoken with disparate accents, made up of people who may converse generally in the same tongue but who hold widely differing views regarding economic and cultural development. This so-called monolithic "English" group includes the very independent-minded people of Prince Edward Island, mostly of Scottish descent, whose province was the cradle of Confederation. The so-called "English" bloc includes the people of our newest province, the province of Newfoundland. The Vikings are supposed to have come to L'Anse-au-Meadow in northern Newfoundland many centuries ago. Perhaps some of my friends from Newfoundland can set the historical date more accurately. But the residents of what was once Britain's oldest colony, the English, Irish and Scottish, had to possess just as tough qualities as Canadians of French descent in order to build homes and raise families in Newfoundland and to carve out existences for themselves. At first they came out to fish. Many years ago, Newfoundlanders tell me, one could put a basket over the side and fill it with fish in five minutes. That has changed somewhat since the foreign fleets came in.

Newfoundland, then, presents a completely different side to the so-called monolithic "English" community. And there are other sides. The other day I spoke to a farmer north of Edmonton. He said, "I protest when they say that I am part of some 'English' monolith. My parents came out from the Ukraine at the turn of the century. They were homesteaders. We are part of the Canadian family too, and we feel very much part of it—and we are proud of our cultural heritage."

So, in addition to our two founding cultures and our two founding races are hundreds of minorities. I recently reviewed the statistics regarding Canada's population. I do not wish to burden honourable senators with details, but there are some interesting facts. Approximately 30 per cent of Canadians are of French descent, 25 per cent English, 10 per cent Scottish, 9½ per cent Irish, 6 per cent German, 3.4 per cent Italian, 2.7 per cent Ukrainian, 2 per cent Dutch, 1.5 per cent Jewish, and less than 1 per cent Welsh. There are many other races. And there are Canadians of other descent—Asian, Scandinavian, Russian, Polish, and native Indians—and all have made a great contribution to the development of Canada. We are better for their presence.

So we have this diversity of ethnic origin, this diversity of region which defies the efforts of some people to say simplistically that national unity is a “dialogue of the St. Lawrence Valley” involving principally the two main founding cultural and linguistic communities.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier spoke about the richness that Canada's cultural diversity confers. He compared it to the components of medieval cathedrals which combine to create magnificent edifices. And yet cultural diversity presents challenges to unity, not only the unity of our two founding cultures but unity which overcomes the barriers of geography and economics as well as the other races, religions and cultures which are part of Canada. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in 1886:

Below the island of Montreal the water that comes from the north unites with the waters that come from the western lakes, but uniting they do not mix.

There they run parallel, separate, distinguishable and yet are one stream—flowing within the same banks—the mighty St. Lawrence and rolling on towards the sea bearing the commerce of our nation upon its bosom—a perfect image of our nation. We may not assimilate—we may not blend—but for all that we are still the component parts of the same country.

National unity, as Laurier suggested, does not mean the abandonment of our cultural heritage; it does not mean the creation of a Canadian melting pot where, by consensus, certain “ideal” attributes are designated and we attempt to persuade everyone to conform to those national “norms”. Such a process could not be attempted in this nation.

Real democracy means the preservation of minority rights, not the imposition of majority privilege. Surely, we are seeking to assure the full flowering of both our founding cultures and their languages while, at the same time, securing the minority rights of all others, and achieving equal justice for all. The process will enrich all of us, and build a better nation.

Had the settlement of Canada been more uniform over the years, had there been an even distribution of French-speaking, English-speaking and other groups from coast to coast since Confederation, perhaps there would be fewer problems concerning unity and understanding today. But that is all past. It is history. Understandably, I think, it is very difficult to convince a native-born British Columbian whose great-grandparents came around Cape Horn by sailing ship from England, and who grew up in an environment almost devoid of the French language and in a community where more people speak Chinese than they do French, that his children today should learn French in order to become Canadian citizens in the fullest sense of the term. For some, the dialogue about the language and culture seems remote and far away—a dialogue of the St. Lawrence Valley—but there are signs that this is changing. There are others, in increasing numbers, in the west, who have taken a new interest in Quebec, who recognize that the ability to speak French and English is a positive cultural advantage of the first order. Language schools and classes in western Canada now have waiting lists, something that has never happened before in the history of this country. The desire to learn French has gripped the imaginations of thousands of people of western Canada, who are beginning to understand the importance of both founding communities being able to do business with the federal government in their own language, the importance for today's generation of youth to acquire a working knowledge of both languages.

Similarly, I suggest it is difficult for some residents of Quebec, born and raised there, to comprehend why a working knowledge of English is desirable and why a knowledge of Ontario, western Canada and the Atlantic provinces is of importance when almost all of their economic and cultural interests are centered in Quebec.

In the ultimate, the events of November 15 may be therapeutic for all of us, for, as the Prime Minister said in his speech in Winnipeg:

This challenge to unity is the west's opportunity—
And, may I add, the east's opportunity as well.

—the west's chance—

Yes, the east's and the west's chance.

—to get a better deal out of Confederation, as it is for all Canadians.

With the expertise which exists in this chamber, we should be able to enunciate and spell out some proposals regarding the strengthening of Confederation.

There is certainly no better time for this self-examination. There has been a change in the country since November 15; not so much a change in attitude as a growing determination by a vast majority of decent, fair-minded Canadians to make themselves heard. There never has been an army—a platoon or two, perhaps, but never an army—of bigots in Canada. There has been, rather, a handful of “snipers” who have commanded attention by the very fact that their views have been a departure from the norm—the sane, sensible norm. I invite honourable senators to examine the letters-to-the-editor pages in newspapers across Canada today. Listen to the open line shows. People of goodwill and generosity of spirit are demanding to be heard.

In recent weeks we have been bombarded with arguments about the financial cost of Confederation. On this point, I recall the leaders of the minuscule western separatist movement coming up with some figures a few months ago purporting to prove that it cost every British Columbian $258 a year to remain in Confederation. Even if that figure were correct—and that is in dispute—it would amount to 70 cents a day. This was their argument to get British Columbia to opt out of Confederation—the 70-cent solution. They were, in effect, saying, “Keep the 70 cents a day in your pocket. Forget about a century of cooperation. Forget the fact that our ancestors founded a nation free of class prejudice and religious persecution. The computer print-out has spoken.” Needless to say, British Columbians have not been impressed by the cause of western separatism.

I was in Calgary, Alberta, making a speech at noon yesterday, and I have to tell you that they do not seem very impressed by western separatism there either. Indeed, in a recent poll taken of public attitudes towards Quebec’s remaining in or out of Confederation, the province of Alberta, I understand, had the highest percentage of people who said, “We want them to stay in.” So much for accusations of Alberta separatism, and the stories that we hear about the allegedly selfish “blue-eyed Arabs” of western Canada.

And so, honourable senators, I hope that this debate will range beyond the slide-rule calculation of Confederation costs, and that it will do more than just articulate attitudes. The discussion will, for example, be an opportunity for senators to focus on constitutional revision. Too often the perennial question of constitutional reform is lofted on high, and we focus on one aspect only, namely, the division of powers between Parliament and the provinces. But let us take this opportunity to examine the role of many federal institutions as they relate to the regions—the House of Commons, the Senate, the Supreme Court, the departments of government, the crown corporations and the rest. Many senators have great expertise in these areas, and could contribute in this way to the national dialogue in the course of this debate.

Quebec maintains that the federal institutions are unresponsive to the linguistic and cultural aspirations of Quebec, and are not able to deal with them. In the west there is a feeling that due to sheer physical distance from Ottawa federal institutions are unresponsive to the needs of westerners. Some maritimers and westerners believe that federal institutions are weighted in favour of central Canada. We can and should, therefore, examine the question of whether our federal bodies are properly servicing regional concerns. While the problems of regional disparity and the desire for recognition of distinct regional concerns have remained basically unchanged throughout our history, the necessity to confront them and find solutions is now both immediate and unavoidable.

The issue of national unity must be approached with an understanding that the political, social and cultural underpinnings which formed the basis for the original constitutional agreement have changed in ways which could not have been anticipated at the time the original bargain was struck, and to say this implies no criticism of the Fathers of Confederation, who showed such remarkable foresight.

Advances in transportation and communications, and the changes brought to our country through massive immigration, have irrevocably and positively changed the nature of our country to the point where we are required to rethink the basis of our union. The election of a government dedicated to the separation of any province from the rest of the country is as much a challenge to all Canadians to try to place their regional desires in the context of the federal state, as it is a political challenge to governments.

The patriation of the Constitution is a good vehicle around which Canadians can and should focus their thinking in an attempt to re-rationalize their concept of their country. The issues raised by patriation are not suited to limited, in-house discussions involving only governments here in Ottawa. Not only have governments shown themselves, at times, to be incapable of arriving at solutions using their own devices, but I believe that the inclusion of a broader range of opinions and suggestions through the participation of large numbers of people is very desirable.

We can and should examine the question of whether our federal bodies are properly servicing regional concerns. The problems of regional disparity and the need for recognition of distinct regional concerns are as old as the nation itself, but now the need to confront these problems is pressing.

As a body formed to protect regional interests, we have an obligation here at some point, I think, to examine the questions of immigration, transportation and communication, and so on, all of which have changed the nature of Canada. In this regard you will recall that I proposed some time ago that we consider the possibility of forming a Senate committee which would travel throughout Canada to hear the views of people in various regions. Suggestions have been advanced from all parties represented in this chamber with respect to this proposal. All of these suggestions have been good and constructive and positive. Many senators on both sides of this chamber agreed that this would be a worthy undertaking. However, some have suggested certain difficulties in framing appropriate terms of reference. Of course, these difficulties exist. Whatever action may be taken by members of this chamber, there appears to be a belief that too seldom do the people of Canada get the opportunity to meet parliamentarians and tell them what is needed. Yet parliamentarians, burdened with a heavy legislative schedule, are unable to get into the country often enough today.

I often think that we require certain fundamental reforms in the way we operate our two houses of Parliament. I think there is great merit in the proposal to close down Parliament for one week at a time, every six weeks, so Parliamentarians can go back to their regions and talk to the people. I think we are caught up in much detail here that is not directly relevant to the pressing concerns of the citizens of this country. One result is that too many people too often must come to Ottawa in order to obtain a hearing. This precludes a healthy dialogue. Too often only the corporations, the unions, and large organized groups can afford the time and money.

I can only restate my belief that it may be time for parliamentarians to descend from the Hill and get out into the country, and not to stand up in the banquet halls of large luxury hotels in order to lecture audiences on national unity, in any province, be it Ontario, Quebec, the prairies, the Atlantic provinces or British Columbia. That should not be our form of activity. We should get into the population centres and towns and listen and learn. I am convinced that we may learn more about regional aspirations from meetings of this kind than from any other source. Such an undertaking would have, in my opinion, considerable merit. It could inspire substantial participation on a non-partisan level—and this debate should be on a non-partisan level—the dialogue in the country.

Honourable senators, the goal of unity will not be achieved by academic symposia alone, regardless of their merit, or by conclaves of economists preparing reports and cost-benefit analyses of Confederation. The battle for unity will be won among the millions of Canadians in every province, who vote, pay taxes, raise their families, are good citizens, and contribute to Canada in thousands of ways, without once being invited to an academic think-tank session or to conferences starring eminent political scientists. Computer print-outs and economic analyses of the cost-benefit ratio will not decide this issue.

Large numbers of Canadians could share in this dialogue about the future of Canada—their country. They could shed much-needed light on many of the problems of regional disparity, which are generally understood, but whose particulars are vague. More important, public hearings in the regions would be one mechanism through which Canadians could see their concerns dealt with directly. It would help to restore some of the faith of those who think their opinion does not matter anymore, that they have little say in their own nation's destiny.

As that most articulate of men, Harry Boyle, in a recent speech stated:

It is time Canadians stopped being diffident, time we dropped our reluctance to show emotion or even passion for our country.

He further said:

Let's stop the clinical dissection and get to the exciting business of creating a positive attitude towards our country. It is the passion and emotion of the people devoted to our own cultural maturity derived from our history and our shared experience that will keep us united.

As I have stated, I would like to see such a committee made up of honourable senators, but I know the feeling of the other chamber. Many members of Parliament have said, "We think the proposal for public hearings in the regions has merit." Some have said, "We think that we should have a committee made up of our members." Whether we work alone or in concert with members of the other place, whether or not any committee of any kind comes into existence, there is an important role for Parliament to play. In any case, I would hope that the inquiry before us will inspire enthusiasm, ideas and commitment. In tandem with efforts in the other chamber, senators can make an outstanding contribution to the cause of national unity and to meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

Whatever we do, wherever we live, whatever our origins, we have a responsibility to pay more than lip service to the idea of national unity and better understanding in this country. To live in Canada is an incredible opportunity in a world where three out of every four people go to bed hungry every evening, where survival itself is the main daily task. I was in another country last month, a great nation beset by inflation, but I was told that inflation is coming under control. The rate is now down to 325 per cent a year. Last year it was 650 per cent. That is only one facet of the agony through which the world is going. Thankfully, we have been spared most of that agony.

A sense of grievance against certain aspects of Confederation surely exists in many regions of Canada, but it fades into insignificance when weighed against the problems endured by other members of the human race. It would be a monumental tragedy if this Confederation, which has served so many Canadians so well, and has served the world so well for 110 years, flounders and becomes a divided, dissected nation.

We must ponder what would be lost by division, and what is to be gained by the process of strengthening national unity and attempting to understand one another better. There is no doubt where Canada's best interests lie. We owe it to those who came before us, those who worked to build this country against all odds. We owe it to our youngsters and to the unborn. The next few months and years will present great challenges, but great opportunities. Let no future historian ever write that the Canadians of this generation were content to witness abjectly or, in our case, preside supinely over the liquidation of Canada.

On motion of Senator Steuart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

*(See p. 705)*VISIT OF DELEGATION OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS TO MEXICO, MARCH 21 TO 28, 1977

JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ

From March 21st to 28th a Canadian delegation visited Mexico to hold the Third Interparliamentary Meeting between Mexico and Canada. The Canadian delegation was headed by Co-chairman Senator Gildas Molgat and Chief Government Whip Gus MacFarlane, M.P. The Mexican Delegation was presided by Representative Augusto Gomez Villanueva as Chairman and Senator Joaquin Gamboa Pascoe as Co-chairman.

Both delegations were received by President José Lopez Portillo, who delivered a message of great importance to Mexican-Canadian relations. The Canadian delegation, through Chief Government Whip Gus MacFarlane, reminded President Lopez Portillo of Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau's invitation to visit Canada. Mr. Lopez Portillo stressed that he will visit Canada as soon as possible.

The Canadian delegation attended a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Congress of Mexico during which greetings were exchanged and Senator Molgat, speaking on behalf of the Canadian Delegation, stated points of view on political, economic and cultural matters of interest to both countries. Senator Alejandro Cervantes gave the Mexican points of view on these matters.

During their stay in Mexico City, the Canadian delegates met with the Secretary of Tourism, Guillermo Rossell, the Mayor of Mexico City, Carlos Hank Gonzalez, and the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Santiago Roel, represented by the Undersecretary Mr. J. J. Olloqui.

The Canadian delegation had the opportunity to meet the Governors of Tabasco, Chiapas, Yucatan and Quintana Roo.

Both delegations held working sessions in Mexico City, during which they exchanged points of view on: Canadian-Mexican relations, trade balance, tourism, air transport, young technicians exchange, migrant workers in agriculture, fisheries, the new international economic order, the defense of prices of raw materials, development financing, cultural relations and energy.

Both delegations agreed that the relations between the two countries have been strengthened and improved. They pointed out the importance and usefulness of the Interparliamentary Meetings to consolidate friendship between these two countries and expressed willingness to continue holding these meetings. They also reaffirmed their conviction that meetings among Heads of Government are valuable means to further understanding and co-operation between countries.

Both delegations recognized that it was desirable to improve the balance of trade. A review should be made of the list of imports and exports between the two countries and new commodities added where possible. An effort should be made for direct bilateral trade rather than having the major amount of imports arrive by means of a third party.

The Canadian delegation undertook to urge Canada to conclude arrangements for the signing of an agreement on standards of quality and health certificates which has now completed the negotiations stage.

After examining official trade statistics between the two countries and knowing the differences on data from each source, both delegations underlined that such discrepancies are due to trade through a third party. Direct bilateral trade would be a good objective for both countries.

The Mexican delegation showed its concern for the possible establishment of import quotas for textiles by Canada, because this would hurt actual exports of Mexican producers. The Canadian delegates indicated a desire not to impose import quotas which would have an adverse effect on Mexico, but in turn were concerned with high unemployment in the Canadian textile industry.

The Canadian and Mexican delegations exchanged points of view on tourism and stressed its importance for the economy of both countries, since it generates employment, increases foreign exchange and is a factor for better understanding among people.

Both delegations agreed that increased tourism should show major concern for the welfare of the individual tourist, both in Canada and Mexico. Also they agreed to make every effort to increase tourism between both countries.

Both delegations referred to the decision of Mexico that led to the establishment of an exclusive economic zone adjacent to its territorial sea and to that of Canada, establishing an exclusive fishing zone from the limit of its own territorial sea. They underlined the importance of these measures for the development of the "Law of the Sea", and also the organization of an adequate exploitation of sea resources that will benefit coastal areas and mankind.

Mexican and Canadian legislators stressed the importance of scientific and technical co-operation for the improvement of the relations between Mexico and Canada and it was agreed that an increased effort has to be made. Upon examining the application of the exchange program of specialists and young technicians in force between the two countries, the results of which have been satisfying, they deemed it advisable to further promote activities within the present framework.

Both delegations think it would be of great use to negotiate through the appropriate channels, an agreement of scientific and technical co-operation between the two countries.

The Canadian delegation and the Mexican delegation examined with special attention the need to better utilize energy resources and to co-operate in research for new sources of energy.

The Canadian delegation expressed its pleasure at the announcement of recent discoveries of large deposits of oil in Mexico.

They look forward to an agreement being reached for the exportation of Mexican oil into Canada.

The Mexican delegation took note of this interest and undertook to recommend it to the proper authorities.

Both delegations exchanged views regarding Mexican migratory agricultural workers in Canada. The Mexican delegation underlined the interest that Mexico has, in increasing the number of such workers to Canada.

The Canadian delegation indicated that the Department of Manpower and Immigration had announced that the same number would be permitted to be employed this year as last year, provided they were employed by the same employers. Heavy unemployment in Canada plays a major role in any decision made concerning migratory workers.

Both delegations agreed that there are great possibilities to develop co-operation in fishery between Canada and Mexico. Special interest was expressed regarding research, exchange of technology, fish processing, the building of ships and joint investments.

The Mexican delegation requested the support of the Canadian delegation in achieving a review of the system applied under the Interamerican Committee on tropical tuna fish. The Canadian delegation intends to bring this to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries and Environment.

The Canadian delegation acknowledged the warm hospitality of the Mexican people and its government and commended the Mexican delegates for their personal interest in making this visit both productive and enjoyable.

The Canadian delegation was composed of:
Senator Gildas Molgat (Co-leader)

Senator Rheal Belisle
Senator Lorne Bonnell
Mr. Gus MacFarlane, M.P. (Co-leader)
Mr. Armand Caouette, M.P.
Mr. Gérard Duquet, M.P.
Mr. Wally Firth, M.P.
Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn, M.P.
Mr. Steve Paproski, M.P.
Mr. Marke Raines, M.P.

The Mexican delegation was composed of:

Members of Congress:

Mr. Augusto Gomez Villanueva (President)
Mr. Juan José Osorio (Co-ordinator of the Meetings)
Mr. Guillermo Cosío Vidaurre
Mr. Abelardo Carrillo Zavala
Mr. Victor Manzanilla Schaffer
Mr. Antonio Tenorio
Mr. Julio Zamora Batiz
Mr. Jaime Sabines Gutiérrez
Mr. Jorge Efrén Domínguez
Mr. Guilebaldo Flores Fuentes
Mr. Victor Alfonso Maldonado
Mrs. María Elena Marqués
Mr. Enrique Gomez Guerra
Mr. Carlos Manuel Vargas Sanchez
Mr. Francisco Cinta Guzman
Mr. Guillermo de Carcer Ballesca
Mr. Salvador Reyes Nevarez
Mrs. Marcela Lombardo de Gutiérrez
Mr. Jesus Gonzalez Balandrano
Mr. Manuel Hernandez Alvarado

Members of the Senate:

Mr. Joaquin Gamboa Pascoe (Co-president)
Mr. Eliseo Mendoza Berrueto
Mr. Humberto Lugo Gil
Mr. Guillermo Morfin Garcia
Mr. José Guadalupe Cervantes Corona
Mr. Gustavo Baz Prada
Mr. Rafael Minor Franco

Mr. Joaquin E. Repetto
Mr. Mario Carballo Pazos

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 18, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN JAMES GREENE, P.C.

CONDITION OF HEALTH

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am pleased to report that the Honourable Senator Greene, who suffered a health setback last evening, is showing signs of improvement this afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HELSINKI AGREEMENT—PRINTED INFORMATION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question, in view of the pending June Belgrade Conference to examine the implementation of the Helsinki Agreement with respect to Basket III, section 2, "Printed Information." I might add, for clarification, that that section states that the participating states should encourage the dissemination of newspapers and printed publications between themselves.

My questions are:

1. What specific efforts has the Canadian government made to promote the export of Canadian printed information to Eastern European Communist countries in view of the Belgrade Conference to be held in June to examine the implementation of the Helsinki Agreement with respect to Basket III, section 2, headed "Printed Information"?

2. What Canadian newspapers, including Canadian ethnic publications, are distributed in Eastern European Communist countries?

3. What are the countries and in what number are these publications distributed in each of these countries?

Senator Perrault: I believe the honourable senator's question, not being a mere interrogation, lends itself more properly to the form of a Notice of Inquiry, and I would ask the honourable senator if I may take his question as such, to be printed in the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate under Inquiries today and on subsequent days until answered?

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

CROWN CORPORATIONS NOT SUBJECT TO AUDIT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I reply to a question asked on May 5 by Senator Grosart? His question was as follows:

I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Would he inform the Senate of the names of those crown corporations which, under the Financial Administration Act, are not subject to audit by the Auditor General of Canada?

He added:

Of course, I do not expect that information today.

I want to tell honourable senators that the question did entail a substantial amount of research. I will keep the answer as brief as possible, and it will not be that long.

I have been provided with lists taken from the listing of "Government-owned and Controlled Corporations," which have recently been prepared at the request of the Privy Council Office, and these lists have been forwarded to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, I understand, in the other place.

The Auditor General audits all of the so-called Schedule "B", "departmental" crown corporations. These crown corporations are as follows:

- Agricultural Stabilization Board
- Atomic Energy Control Board
- Director of Soldier Settlement
- The Director, Veterans' Land Act
- Economic Council of Canada
- Fisheries Prices Support Board
- Medical Research Council
- Municipal Development and Loan Board

National Museums of Canada

National Research Council

Science Council of Canada

Unemployment Insurance Commission

The Auditor General audits all of the so-called Schedule "C", "agency" crown corporations. These are as follows:

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited

Canadian Arsenals Limited

Canadian Commercial Corporation

Canadian Dairy Commission

Canadian Film Development Corporation

Canadian Livestock Feed Board

Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited

Canadian Patents and Development Limited

Canadian Saltfish Corporation

Centennial Commission

Crown Assets Disposal Corporation

Defence Construction (1951) Limited

Loto Canada Inc.

The National Battlefields Commission

National Capital Commission

National Harbours Board

Northern Canada Power Commission

Royal Canadian Mint

Uranium Canada Limited

The Auditor General audits 15 of the 22 Schedule "D", "proprietary" crown corporations. I am almost through the list now, honourable senators, and this list reads as follows:

Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation

Eldorado Aviation Limited

Eldorado Nuclear Limited

Export Development Corporation

Farm Credit Corporation

Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation

Northern Transportation Company Limited

The Pilotage Authorities:

Atlantic; Laurentian; Great Lakes; and Pacific

St. Lawrence Seaway Authority

The Seaway International Bridge Corporation Limited

Telelobe Canada (formerly Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation)

No auditor has yet been appointed for the Federal Exchange Corporation, which is not yet operational. The remaining six schedule "D" corporations are audited by the private sector auditors listed in this document which, if the honourable senator desires, I shall most certainly have inscribed in the record of today's proceedings.

Senator Flynn: How many are there? Six?

Senator Perrault: Yes, honourable senator.

Senator Flynn: Well, why do you not read them? You have already read a list of approximately 40 corporations.

Senator Perrault: I will do that. We always attempt to be cooperative in every possible way.

Air Canada is not audited by the Auditor General, but by the company of Coopers & Lybrand. Canadian National Railways is audited by the same company. The Cape Breton Development Corporation is audited by Touche, Ross & Co. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is audited by Clarkson, Gordon & Co. and Raymond, Chabot, Martin, Paré & Associés. The Federal Business Development Bank, formerly the Industrial Development Bank, is audited by Price, Waterhouse & Co. Petro-Canada is audited by Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co. So those are the exceptions.

In the past the nature of a corporation's business has seemed to dictate whether or not private sector auditors would be named as the company's auditors. Section 67 of the Financial Administration Act states that if:

(1) no provision is made in an Act of Parliament for the appointment of an auditor, or

(2) the auditor is to be appointed pursuant to the Canada Corporations Act, then the Governor in Council shall designate the auditor. The same section of the act also makes the Auditor General eligible to be appointed the auditor, or a joint auditor, of a crown corporation.

Apart from the one crown corporation that is not yet operational, of the 52 listed there are only six which are not audited by the Auditor General, the names of which have been given today. The audit requirements of the majority of those six corporations are detailed in their constituent acts. The Auditor General also audits a number of other government entities which are not classified as crown corporations.

• (1410)

Senator Grosart: At the time the question was asked, the Leader of the Opposition added a rider which the Leader of the Government may not have heard. That rider, as I recall, requested that the Leader of the Government give the reasons why these six corporations were exempt from audit by the Auditor General.

Perhaps the leader would take that as a supplementary question and, in due course, provide the Senate with an explanation as to why six of the 52 corporations are exempt from public audit.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators may recall that in my reply I stated that the audit requirements for the majority of these six corporations are detailed in their constituent acts. Should the honourable senator require a more detailed explanation, I shall most certainly seek such an explanation.

Senator Grosart: The point I am making is that there must be a reason why the audit requirements are covered by the constituent acts rather than by the Financial Administration Act, which covers the rest.

Senator Perrault: I can only say that legislation provided that certain corporations should be handled in that way, and the proposal was endorsed by Parliament.

However, I would be pleased to take that part of the honourable senator's inquiry as notice and obtain, if possible, a more complete explanation.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question. It may be that I did not understand the answer fully. I thought I understood the Leader of the Government to say that in respect of these six corporations it is still the prerogative of the government to order that they be audited by the Auditor General or, to use his term, a public auditor. If that is so, would the Leader of the Government inform the Senate as to the reasons which led the government of the day to decide not to take advantage of this opportunity?

Senator Perrault: I shall take your inquiry as notice, and perhaps incorporate a reply into the reply to Senator Grosart's question.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government if the presence of Senator Argue at the back of him indicates that he has been appointed assistant government whip? It would be a rather surprising choice.

Senator Argue: You wouldn't know in which direction you were about to go.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 10, the debate on the motion of Senator Bourget for the second reading of Bill C-9, to approve, give effect to and declare valid certain agreements between the Grand Council of the Crees (of Quebec), the Northern Quebec Inuit Association, the Government of Quebec, la Société d'énergie de la Baie James, la Société de développement de la Baie James, la Commission hydro-électrique de Québec and the Government of Canada and certain other related agreements to which the Government of Canada is a party.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, first I would like to thank Senator Bourget for his presentation on Bill C-9, recognizing that the subject was not easy. Nevertheless, Senator Bourget has succeeded in stating clearly the objectives and goals the government is pursuing with this legislation. However, for a better understanding of this legislation, I think we should track back its historical origins.

All will recall that before announcing the James Bay project in 1971 the former Premier of Quebec had not taken into account the need to determine the environmental impact of such a venture in the north. And more important still, I think, the fact that the lands concerned had been inhabited and used from the very beginning by the natives had not been recognized. I read this morning in the Montréal-Matin an interview former Premier Bourassa gave to Canadian journalists: he was reviewing his administration and admitted that while the James Bay project had been a great challenge for him economically, he had been blundering when announcing the James Bay project in 1971. What surprised us most at the time has been, in my opinion, the federal government's inaction after the decision made by Quebec to launch into the James Bay project without any prior consultation. So at the beginning the natives were isolated without any political and economic power, and they were in danger of losing their culture, their way of life, and of being themselves annihilated in a fight they were waging alone against national and international interests which were very powerful and which supported the James Bay project.

So instead of exercising right at the outset its authority under the Constitution, the government preferred to abandon the natives to their own resources and opted for inaction. Yet, all previous governments had at least recognized the native people's territorial rights, except for the present government when it released its white paper on Indian policy in 1969. The Prime Minister had then said, about the native people's rights: "Perhaps this is not the right answer, nor the one that is accepted, but our answer is no." That was when he was questioned about the native people's rights over their territories. As you know, it was only after a ruling by the Supreme Court in 1973, the Nishga decision, that the government changed its declaratory policy on the existence of natives' rights. You will remember that the six judges had held that the rights of the native people over their territories were founded. Following that decision, the Prime Minister said to the native people:

Perhaps you have more rights than we first thought when we published the white paper on the Indian issue.

I am saying, honourable senators, that the federal government abdicated its constitutional and tutorial responsibilities in the administration of native territory by maintaining a position of vigilant neutrality in the conflict which opposed the natives, the Government of Quebec and the subsidiary companies.

In 1971, a resolution adopted by the James Bay Indian chiefs was sent to the then Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development urging him to interrupt the James Bay project. We remember that the minister did not move. In 1972, the Indians had to file an injunction before the Superior Court requesting it to recognize their rights and to have them respected by the Government of Quebec, Hydro and the Société d'énergie de la Baie James which were encroaching on their land. Obviously, the federal government—as Senator Bourget mentioned last week—intervened at that point and said to the natives: "Well, if you wish to go before the Superior Court to have your rights recognized, we are prepared to cover court costs, to provide you with lawyers so that your case will be presented properly before the Superior Court." You will remember that at the time the Superior Court recognized the exclusive rights of the natives over the northern territories and upheld the injunction against the government of Quebec.

It was only at that moment that discussions between the Government of Quebec, the Société d'énergie de la Baie James, the Commission hydro-électrique de Québec and the Société de développement de la Baie James were initiated. Faced with an injunction from the Superior Court, the Quebec government was forced to discuss a possible compromise with the native people. Of course, and this I stress formally, the Quebec government and the companies mentioned were the first negotiators. The federal government was not. As I mentioned a while ago, the federal government had, to my mind, abdicated its constitutional and tutorial responsibilities towards the native people since it waited till Quebec was forced to act by an injunction. Then, the federal government stepped into the negotiations.

During the negotiations on the selection of lands for the Inuit, the Province of Quebec had indicated that no agreement could be reached without the consent of Hydro-Quebec.

So, you see the situation. The Quebec government tells the Inuit and the Crees: "We are ready to reach agreement but they will not be valid until such time as Hydro-Quebec has accepted them." The Government of Quebec therefore substituted itself to a government commission, namely Hydro-Quebec, to negotiate with the native people, the Crees or the Inuit. For its part, Hydro-Quebec had declared itself unwilling to select lands unless the Inuit accepted, in writing, conditions that exceeded by far the provisions of the agreement now before us. Those conditions can be summed up as follows, and I quote:

The Inuit will never invoke factors of social bearing or the eventual results of hydroelectric development along the coast at Watapaka, Payne, Leaf, Caniapiscaw, Lanch, Whale and on the Georges river, to oppose them or interfere with them.

Still the conditions and prerequisites to negotiating an agreement were put in writing. Hydro-Quebec had already insinuated that first the Inuit and the Crees had to fulfill some requirements before starting the discussion. Obviously, the natives, namely the Inuit and the Crees, were put immediately in a situation where they had to negotiate within prerequisites—they could not negotiate freely, they had to take it or leave it. These prerequisites had to be accepted first and only then agreements would be negotiated.

If you have read the agreement which was signed, you can see that this position goes openly against its spirit and its letter and that it will undermine the development of the natives and destroy their culture and their economy. As mentioned by Senator Bourget, this agreement raises a number of serious political problems although it was the result of a compromise between the interested parties. Among all these problems, the greatest threat to the Canadian native people comes from the decision to allow the Government of Quebec to shape their future as it pleases, without taking into consideration at all the constitutional jurisdiction of the federal government in this area. I find support for this assertion in the statement made on November 6, 1975 by the representative for Mont-Royal to the National Assembly, Mr. John Caccia, who served as the negotiator of the provincial government, when he said, and I quote:

As a matter of fact, the agreement will preempt the federal Indian Act.

I repeat the statement of the representative for Mont-Royal, who was the negotiator for the provincial government:

As a matter of fact, the agreement will preempt the federal Indian Act.

He added the following:

Our objective is to introduce a new concept in the Quebec legislation: the establishment of a community in which the Crees and the Inuit will settle of their own free will but which is also to be open to the rest of the population.

As far as I am concerned, of course I did not have time as is the case for many senators—I think most of them did not have time either—to study the details of the convention that the natives have concluded with the Government of Quebec and the federal government. But I make the same interpretation of it as the member for Mont-Royal.

There is no doubt that this convention infringes upon the powers of the federal government as stipulated in section 91 of the British North America Act which provides for exclusive jurisdiction of the federal Parliament over legislative matters but which has also permitted in the past, in 1912, to pass the Indian Act. My opinion is that our committee will have to take a close look at this constitutional problem to find a solution.

[English]

Honourable senators, I have read the bill carefully, and have found that basically there are two things wrong with it as presently drafted. The Senate can, in my opinion, correct one defect, and helpfully contribute towards correcting the other. The defect which the Senate can itself correct is contained in clause 5 and subsequent clauses relating to parliamentary oversight of future amending agreements, and agreements with the presently non-signatory native groups.

Senator Bourget, at page 681 of Debates of the Senate for Tuesday May 10, 1977, said that those clauses give the House of Commons and the Senate the opportunity of discussing and voting on such future agreements, and thus protecting the rights of the native parties.

Clause 5 provides that there is to be no discussion of a further agreement in either house unless 20 senators or 50 members of the House of Commons request it; and their request must be in the form of a negative motion—for example, "That the agreement not be approved, unless . . ." That is, the agreement is approved unless both houses pass negative resolutions. Then Parliament will be faced with agreements already signed rather than with proposed agreements, making the task of modifying them somewhat more difficult.

I do not like this formula. It would be better to have proposed agreements instead of signed agreements laid before both Houses of Parliament and referred to committees thereof, and for them to be subject to positive, rather than negative, resolutions of both houses.

I turn now to a more basic defect of the bill. This is the question of the extinguishment of the rights of a large number of native non-signatories, or third parties, to the agreement. Senator Bourget said last week that in the House of Commons standing committee the native peoples who are parties to the agreement indicated their satisfaction regarding this agreement, but he neglected to mention that the native people who are not parties to the agreement, but whose said rights are to be extinguished by the bill, also appeared and unanimously declared their dissatisfaction with clause 3(3).

I want to mention a few groups that have appeared before the House of Commons committee. There were: The Labrador Inuit Association; the Montagnais-Naskapi Inuit Association of Labrador; Le Conseil Attikamek-Montagnais of Quebec; the Abitibi-Dominion band of Algonquins at Amos; the Inuit Tapérisat of Canada for the Inuit of the Belcher Islands and southern Baffin Island, l'Alliance Laurentienne des Métis et des Indiens sans Statut. The National Indian Brotherhood, the Native Council of Canada Limited and the Confederation of Indians of Quebec supported before that committee the position of the non-signatory groups and third parties.

Senator Bourget drew the attention of the Senate to article 2.14 of the agreement, with regard to which he said that "le Québec s'engage à négocier sans statut" with the non-signatories, and stated it as the view of the federal government that the non-signatories are protected thereby. But he neglected to mention the unusual, striking and bizarre article 2.6 of the agreement, which provides that the present law must extinguish the rights of those same third parties, who are thus said to be protected, in violation of the principle that in French we call:

[Translation]

You cannot stipulate for someone else. That is a tenet of civil law which I believe all lawyers here will endorse.

[English]

Senator Bourget also drew the attention of the Senate to the statement by Premier Lévesque, in his inaugural address of May 8, to the effect that negotiations will continue with the Indian nation. I repeat: Premier Lévesque said that negotiations "will continue". He did not say in his speech that he would settle the rights of the non-signatory groups, and the rights of the other Indian nations which were not involved in the agreement.

What is less clear is whether Premier Lévesque was then aware, or is now aware, or whether the public is aware, that it is proposed that these future negotiations are proposed to be carried out in a very difficult context, since we said that we would first extinguish these rights, and negotiate them afterwards.

Senator Bourget referred to the gratifying progress which has taken place in the negotiations with the Naskapi of Schefferville. This is certainly a good sign, but he neglected to mention that the Naskapi of Schefferville had the advantage of negotiating before, rather than after, the loss of their rights. Before the House of Commons committee this group of Indians opposed the final passage of Bill C-9 before the full completion of their negotiations. After that they withdrew their opposition to the bill in return for alternative guarantees, or a commitment, by Quebec, not only to negotiate, as Premier Lévesque said in his inaugural speech would be the case with regard to the other groups as per article 2.14, but to give them certain agreed benefits as a minimum protection not yet achieved by the other third parties.

While the state of Premier Lévesque's knowledge of these matters is not clear, that of his deputy premier, Jacques-Yvan Morin is much less so. You will recall that when Jacques-Yvan Morin was the Leader of the Opposition for the Parti Québécois, in June 1975 and July 1976 he opposed as unjust, and as a dangerous precedent, the extinguishment of the rights of the third parties. Unfortunately, since the change in government in Quebec, the new Minister of Natural Resources and of Lands and Forests, Yves Bérubé, has taken the opposite point of view, namely, that the bill must be passed as it is in this regard, and that he will not accept any modification of the rights of the third parties.

On March 1, Mr. Allmand, the minister, wrote to Mr. Bérubé, asking him if he would accept modification to article 2.6, and to clause 3(3) of the bill, to safeguard the rights of the third parties. In the House of Commons committee Mr. Allmand testified that Mr. Bérubé had given him, by telephone, a negative reply. In the house itself more recently Mr. Allmand mentioned that Mr. Bérubé had confirmed that negative response by letter. I think it would be interesting for the Senate committee to see that letter, and especially to know if Mr. Bérubé stated any reasons for his refusal.

[Translation]

This issue is more important than some people might think, and serious studies are being made specifically on the attitude of the Quebec government. I believe that several members have heard about a young student at the history doctorate level at the University of Manitoba, Kenneth M. Narvey, who wrote a letter to the newspaper Le Devoir on May 6, 1977. This letter, which is addressed to Mr. René Lévesque, asks certain questions about the rights of non-signatory parties to the agreement. I would like to quote a few paragraphs. In his letter, Mr. Narvey says the following:

Bill C-9 is at the same time fair and unfair.

I note in passing that this young man, Mr. Narvey, is particularly interested in the problem since he followed closely the discussions in the committee of the House of Commons and has made some research on Bill C-9.

The bill is fair because of the intent of the legislator to implement the provisions of the James Bay agreement according to which the native signatory parties, the Crees and the Inuit, will relinquish their native rights all over Quebec in exchange for certain benefits.

The bill is unfair because it extinguishes, under clause 3(3), and without their consent, in the part of Quebec north of the divide (called "the Territory"), all the native rights and claims of many Indians other than the Crees (whether they are status Indians or not) and of the non-consenting Inuit, who are all non-signatory parties or third parties to the agreement, with only an assurance that Quebec will commit itself to negotiate their claims with them once the said claims have been so extinguished.

As I said earlier, Quebec says: Yes, we are ready to negotiate, but we shall first of all put your rights aside, and then, we shall negotiate.

Here, Mr. Narvey says what I said earlier and recalls the attitudes of the present government when, in November 1975 and June 1976, Jacques-Yvan Morin, then leader of the official opposition, gave his support on behalf of the opposition to the principle of the bill. However, he had reserved the rights of the opposition concerning the claims of non-status Indians and others not party to the agreement. I repeat what I said earlier, Mr. Morin said at the time that it was an unfair decision, that it created a dangerous precedent, and he cautioned the Liberal government of the time that the Parti Québécois was opposed to the fact that the rights of non-status Indians were not negotiated before the signing of the agreement.

Mr. Narvey goes on:

After hearing the evidence brought before the standing committee by third parties, the present federal position is as follows: the federal government is prepared to amend the bill in such a way as to not extinguish the rights of third parties, if Quebec agrees to it.

But since the Parti Québécois has been in power, it would seem that the deputy premier, Mr. Morin, has held to the position which he adopted when he was the leader of the official opposition, but the present minister responsible for those negotiations, the Minister of Natural Resources, Lands and Forests, Mr. Bérubé, is reported to have agreed to non-signatory third parties that their rights will be recognized.

Therefore, given this situation, it is obvious that the native groups who feel frustrated are turning towards the Senate whose aim and object is to protect minorities' rights.

Those groups which are not covered by the agreement enjoy some rights which have been recognized for a long time, since the beginning of history, since the treaties. Those people, being minority groups, cannot now rely on the Quebec government's attitude, in particular its Minister of Natural Resources, who says: We are in no way amending this agreement we concluded with the Inuit and the Crees. We are going to sign it in its present form and afterwards we will renegotiate the rights of minority groups which are not covered by the agreement.

I believe it is fair, honourable senators, that we should at this stage fulfill the responsibility conferred upon us by the Constitution, which is to protect the rights of minority groups, those groups who feel frustrated and whose rights are being denied under the agreement now before us.

This is why, I suggest, the Senate committee to which Bill C-9 will be referred will have to act with a very open mind in order to hear dissenting groups which will want to express to the committee their concerns as regards the document that was signed by both the federal and provincial governments. Essentially, they want us to give them some assurance that the rights they are enjoying now will be respected by both the federal and the Quebec provincial government.

I received representations from these minority groups. What would happen if Quebec separated and became independent? What would become of those minorities' rights? Would Quebec hold to its commitments? Would it still be prepared to negotiate with third parties? Those are all unanswered questions which minority groups are asking themselves.

I, for one, take strong exception to an unilateral infringement on the rights some Indian groups are enjoying on this territory, without providing them with at least a legal means of appealing one day against this land spoliation. Let a mechanism be set up so that, if they are not treated justly by the Quebec government, those minority groups can at least appeal its decision before a competent tribunal. Of course, nothing is mentioned in the agreement about such recourse.

The Montagnais Association stated before the committee that passage of the bill was a unilateral step concerning their rights, offering no possibility for later negotiations.

The Inuit Tapirisat of Canada Association stated, before the committee of the House of Commons, and I quote:

The most crucial question is that no consideration was given to the third parties and the non-signatories who explained their case to the federal and provincial governments and urged them to study with care the matter of the rights of the minorities.

Honourable senators, I think I have said enough to explain to some extent the point of view of the opposition on the matter. The bill is extremely complex and interesting. I invite honourable senators who sit on the committee, and the others, to reflect on the problem in an effort to find a solution so that we may, once in a while, fulfill our roles as senators, which is to protect the rights of the minorities, and in particular, in this instance, of those minorities which are our native people.

[English]

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable senator permit a question? Does he know the number involved in this non-signatory group—the third parties to which he referred during the course of his speech—and how that number relates to the number actually covered by the agreement annexed to the bill?

Senator Asselin: Those involved in the signed agreement are Inuit and Crees. However, I was making reference to this minority which is included in the majority. Does that answer your question?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Do you know the number?

Senator Asselin: No, I do not. Perhaps Senator Bourget knows the answer to that.

Senator Bourget: Honourable senators, I do not have the exact number, but I believe that of the total population it represents approximately two-thirds. Of the Inuit and Crees I believe it would represent more than 80 per cent. However, I will obtain the exact figures to present when I answer my friend next week.

Senator Flynn: It is important enough.

Senator Bourget: Yes, I know.

Senator Haig: Honourable senators, I was advised last weekend that those in the Cree agreement number approximately 10,000, and those not in the agreement number approximately 6,000.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): May I ask a question of the honourable senator, whose speech we all appreciated very much—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): —because it gave us a good understanding of the background and was a fine supplement to Senator Bourget's speech. I speak again out of a great depth of ignorance, but it seems to me that there is a very large amount of money—millions of dollars—which is decreed to be set aside, or which is proposed, for the settlement of these land claims.

Senator Asselin: $200 million.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Is that to be paid by the Province of Quebec alone?

Senator Asselin: Both.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Both federal and provincial? Does the honourable senator know in what proportion?

Senator Asselin: I am not sure of the proportion.

Senator Bourget: To answer the question I would refer my honourable friend to the speech I made last week. If I remember correctly, out of a total of $225 million, the federal government will pay $75 million, and the remainder will be paid by the Province of Quebec. I understand that the first federal payment will be in the order of $32.75 million. However, the exact answer to my friend's question is contained in the speech I made last week.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS MONITORING BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-4, intituled: "An Act to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada".—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave, I yield to Senator Barrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Augustus Irvine Barrow moved the second reading of Bill S-4, to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-4, of which I have the honour to move second reading today, has as its purpose a matter which is of the utmost concern to all Canadians. As its short title suggests, it is to provide for the monitoring of the expenditures made by petroleum companies in the search for and development of new energy supplies in relation to the additional income received as a result of increased petroleum and natural gas prices. The effect of this bill will be to provide the government with the necessary authority to require a designated group of petroleum companies to report certain financial and other statistical information relating to their affairs, which will enable the minister to assess their individual and collective activities and thereby ascertain that the additional revenues these companies receive are being used to secure energy in Canada.

Over the past three years there has been a great deal of discussion and, indeed, justifiable alarm about the "energy crisis." In the winter of 1973-74, for some countries, because of the embargo imposed by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting countries (OPEC), the energy crisis was a crisis of supply. The supply crisis was underscored again during this past winter in parts of the northeastern United States. Fuel supplies proved to be inadequate to cope with the extreme adverse weather conditions, and many cities in that region found it necessary to ask householders to reduce temperatures in their homes and, what was worse, it became necessary to close schools, factories and other businesses which resulted in the loss of jobs and production as well as a great disruption in the education of many children.

The Canadian government has been striving to ensure that this will not happen here, but our energy self-reliance can only be assured if all levels of government, the petroleum industry, and all Canadians work together toward the national energy policies as outlined in the publication An Energy Strategy for Canada which was issued under the authority of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in 1976.

For many Canadians the energy crisis is most apparent as a crisis of price, and a crisis of adjustment to escalating energy prices. Our nation appears to have massive reserves of petroleum locked in the tar sands, huge potential production in heavy oil, and significant additional reserves available through enhanced recovery techniques as well as from frontier and offshore areas, but all of these additional reserves are extremely costly to develop. If they are developed, we will have a degree of energy self-reliance which directly corresponds to our reduced dependence on imported oil.

There are several obvious advantages to energy self-reliance. For example, our balance of payments would not be encumbered by oil imports and we would not be as vulnerable to the vicissitudes of world inflation levels. But, most important of all, development of these resources would provide Canada with security of supply.

However, lest anyone should consider the development of high-cost domestic petroleum reserves as the panacea for all of Canada's energy problems, it must be emphasized that there are dangers and difficulties inherent in this plan. Aside from the necessity for improved technology to make possible the development of these reserves, there will be a requirement for huge amounts of capital. In addition, these expenditures will have to be phased in such a manner so as to correspond to our technical and financial ability and, with respect to the latter consideration, investment must be timed with regard to inflationary considerations. Even as these difficulties are overcome, there is an even more crushing blow that we may have to face, and that is that, having developed high-cost domestic reserves, should the world price for crude oil dramatically fall we would be tied to our domestic sources. Such an event would require another traumatic period of adjustment.

The government has carefully weighed all of these prospects, and a course of action has been charted and pursued which will provide effective leadership and capable management through the difficult period of adjustment in the years ahead.

As announced in Parliament and stated elsewhere, since 1974 the policy of the Canadian government has been to increase petroleum and natural gas prices over a period of time toward world price levels. This policy encourages conservation. In addition, it makes additional reserves economically exploitable, including many of the previously mentioned high-cost reserves, and it makes greater revenue available to the petroleum and natural gas producing companies to allow them to invest a larger volume of funds in the search for, and the development of, new energy supplies.

Bill S-4 seeks to provide the government with the authority to verify that the Canadian petroleum and natural gas consumers, who must pay the higher prices for gasoline to run their automobiles, for oil and natural gas to heat their homes, and for fuel for their industries, are receiving an appropriate reaction from the petroleum industry, and an appropriate reaction is one that entails an increased level of expenditure by petroleum companies in the search for, and the development of, new energy supplies, corresponding to the increased level of revenues they receive as a result of increased prices; or, to put it bluntly, to ensure that additional revenues received by the oil companies for Canadian oil and gas as a result of increased world prices are used to develop additional reserves and not used for other unrelated purposes.

This measure also provides for a standard method of reporting by a select sample of companies. Only a portion of the petroleum industry will be monitored, the reason being that it was found that a small group of approximately 35 companies out of a total in excess of 600 accounted for almost 90 per cent of the total assets, revenues, profits and capital expenditures in the entire industry. It was therefore decided to survey only the group of 35, with the peripheral industry participants excluded. It will, however, be necessary to occasionally revise and amend the list, increasing or decreasing the number of companies to be surveyed to correspond to significant changes in the circumstances of industry members. The 35 companies in question are listed in Schedules I and II to the bill.

Certain penalties for non-compliance are prescribed within the proposed legislation in order to make sure that all of the companies who are requested to report will make full and complete disclosure of their cash flows and expenditures. There is also provision made for selective spot audits of company records, and those spot audits may be carried out at the discretion of those administering the proposed act. It will be the prerogative of the minister to disclose any or all of the individual company data in the House of Commons or elsewhere, except where such disclosure will, in the opinion of the minister, impair the competitive position of a company. The officials conducting the monitoring survey will not disclose individual company data to any person other than the minister.

In order to standardize the reporting of information and make it available to the minister in a useful form, a questionnaire, which may be periodically revised, has been designed by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, in consultation with the industry members participating in the National Advisory Committee on Oil Policy.

If passed, Bill S-4 will provide an important element in the government's overall energy strategy. The important decision has been made to foster the development of indigenous sources of energy. In order for this program to proceed, the efforts of all Canadians and the close cooperation and assistance of the petroleum industry is required. It is of fundamental importance that Canadians know with certainty that the sacrifices they are making, and will be required to make, to meet increased energy costs are not being made in vain.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

MARITIME CODE BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 12, the debate on the motion of Senator Cook for the second reading of Bill C-41, to provide a maritime code for Canada and to amend the Canada Shipping Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to begin by expressing my gratitude and, I am sure, the gratitude of all honourable senators to Senator Cook for his very clear and concise exposition of the contents of this bill in sponsoring it in the Senate. However, I think there are some other things which might usefully be said in relation to this extremely important bill—the importance of which is perhaps not at once quickly recognized.

Bill C-41 not only affects the oceans which bound our eastern, western and northern shores, the great inland waterway of the St. Lawrence Seaway, the Great Lakes, but all our other innumerable navigable waters. Not only does it affect that great portion of our total land area but it may well affect, and will indeed affect, a greater portion of our total export-import trade which, as I am sure all honourable senators know, amounts to many billions of dollars per year and is the lifeblood of our economic situation in all of Canada, and the support of a very high proportion of our employment in Canada.

Perhaps I might draw attention to the fact that the substance of this bill has been a long time in the parliamentary works. The substance of Bill C-41 first came before Parliament in the form of Bill C-216, introduced in the other place on July 23, 1973, which will soon be four years ago. Incidentally, I hope that on the fourth anniversary of the substance of this bill coming before Parliament, we may be occupied in some other activity more appropriate to the time of year than we were on that day in 1973. That bill died on the order paper.

Its substance was again introduced in the other place, as Bill C-61, on May 26, 1975. Second reading was moved on November 21, 1975, and it too suffered what one might call a somewhat violent death on the order paper at the end of the last session.

Now we have before us Bill C-41, which was introduced on March 9 this year and read the second and third time, without reference to committee, in the other place on May 6, 1977. The reasons given for this very expeditious handling of second and third readings and committee and report stages in the other place was that it had been fully debated on the previous occasions to which I have referred. This seems fair enough, having read the lengthy debates as reported in Hansard of the other place in reference to the predecessor bills.

So, honourable senators, we have very little to study or reflect upon in the debates in the other place in the current session with reference to this particular bill. But I would ask honourable senators to recall that on November 21, 1975, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport in the other place—the minister apparently having delegated the duty of supporting this bill to his parliamentary secretary—said, as reported at page 9340 of House of Commons Debates, that the main body of the bill, then Bill C-61, was intended primarily to do two things—first, it contained certain provisions with reference to the coasting trade in Canada; and, second, it would provide the authority upon which a hoped for comprehensive Maritime Code might rest.

As is the case in the present bill, at that time much of the Maritime Code as was then prepared by the government to present to Parliament was contained in Schedule III of the bill which, incidentally, seemed to be rather a strange way to deal with something of such fundamental importance. But that is a comment by the way. The first two schedules to Bill C-61, as is the case now with Bill C-41, simply dealt with the series of related and consequential amendments which necessarily flowed from the bill itself. The first two schedules also provide a means for eventually phasing out the present Canada Shipping Act over a period of time, which looks as though it might be quite an extended period of time.

The parliamentary secretary said on that occasion that the portion of the Maritime Code as set out in the third schedule to that bill, and it is the same with the present bill—I keep referring to what was said about the previous bill because, as I pointed out earlier, nothing much was said about the present bill—consisted of two major portions which have been technically named “Books”. I suppose that is as good a name as any. The first major portion, or book, deals with general matters related to shipping, and the second with the ship itself.

He then said the code will eventually consist of five major books, the three books still to come—and they are still to come; they are not included in this successor bill—are expected to relate, one, to the law concerning crew standards; two, to cargo and cargo safety; and, three, to operational standards. To me at least—and I hope, honourable senators, to you—it seems worth noting that a year-and-a-half ago, and indeed, I suppose, longer ago than that, we had the same two books of the proposed five of the Maritime Code as appear in Bill C-41 now. One could perhaps be pardoned for hoping that after such a lapse of time we could see some progress in the form of at least one of the remaining three books on such an important subject.

If the revision of the Canada Shipping Act is as urgent and important as the government would have us believe, it seems to me passing strange that though nearly four years have gone by since the first attempt at such legislation was placed before Parliament in the other house, we still have only two books of the code out of the five proposed. As I have said, I do not dispute for a moment that the subject of shipping is of the most vital importance to Canada, to Canada's economy and to individual Canadians. There is a very great number of Canadians, in proportion to the total population, whose occupation results from the activities of shipping and trade carried in and upon that shipping, and this makes it a subject which we all should take very seriously.

Senator Cook said, quite correctly, and I take no issue with this whatever, that the present act, the Canada Shipping Act, is based in very large measure upon the shipping law of the United Kingdom. I agree with him too that it is highly desirable to replace it with a law designed to serve Canadian circumstances and Canadian needs, and that this can best be done by a comprehensive revision of the existing act.

Earlier—that is, a few moments ago—I drew attention to the fact that in the 1975 bill, Bill C-61, there was contained as one of its major components certain provisions dealing with the coasting trade of Canada. These provisions, perhaps somewhat to the surprise of the then sponsor of the bill, became very controversial indeed, and it seems to me perfectly correct to say that there is no doubt whatever that the chief reason why

Bill C-61 was allowed to die on the order paper was because of its controversial nature, and because it was recognized that this controversy had a sound basis in fact.

The bill now before us—and this is really the only difference between it and Bill C-61 of any significance—has omitted the provisions about the coasting trade entirely. Accordingly, we are not faced with the controversy which arose out of those provisions in earlier times. Whether or not in due course the government puts forward legislation to deal with the coasting trade, we shall have to wait and see, but I might be justified, honourable senators, on the basis of the history of this bill, in venturing the opinion that we might have to wait quite a long time.

As I have indicated, except for the omission of provisions relating to the coasting trade of Canada contained in Bill C-61, the bill now before us is almost exactly the same as the other provisions of that bill. For instance, by way of illustration, in the former bill the coasting trade was dealt with in clauses 8 to 14 inclusive. So far as I can make out from a comparison of Bill C-41 and Bill C-61, those clauses have simply been omitted from the present bill and clauses 1 to 7 of the present bill are almost exact copies of clauses 1 to 7 in the former bill.

Perhaps I might be allowed to refer for a moment to the Canada Shipping Act as it now stands. It is Chapter S-9 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, as amended. I would just like to draw attention to the fact that this act consists of some 374 pages—a total thickness of perhaps three-quarters of an inch—that it has some 20 parts, which in the present bill I suppose would be called “books”, and some 727 sections and four schedules. It is, therefore, a large statute in volume of words, a large statute in volume of subjects covered, and a large statute in the scope which that large number of subjects deal with.

To illustrate the relatively small portion of the total which Bill C-41 deals with, may I say that there are only some sections of it which are in fact now dealt with. For instance, the present bill amends one section by changing the definition of the words “builder’s mortgage.” It repeals sections 4 to 44 inclusive, and altogether repeals or amends 164 sections of the present act. You will remember that there are in total 727 sections.

It seems, therefore, that there are about 563 sections of the present act still to be dealt with in some future legislation. Of course, there are also to be dealt with the matters set out in the existing schedules to the Canada Shipping Act.

To add to the monumental task involved, there are a great many other acts which are affected by any revision of the Canada Shipping Act. For instance, in the relatively small portion of the total subjects covered by Bill C-41, the kind and quantity of acts which have to be dealt with in some way are set out in Schedules I and II. These mention a total of 29 other statutes now in existence, apart from the Canada Shipping Act, which are affected in such a way by this bill that changes have to be made to them by legislation. How many other acts will be affected by the legislation which purports to deal with the remaining 563 sections of the Canada Shipping Act I do not venture to guess; but one can reasonably believe that there will be many of them indeed. Perhaps this indicates again the large volume of work which still remains to be done.

As Senator Cook said, Schedule III of the bill contains the first portion of the proposed total Maritime Code. That portion consists of the parts designated as Books I and II. The use of the word “book”, as I have said, is just a convenient way of dividing the statute into certain related parts.

Book I in the bill is headed “General.” It is divided into two parts: Division A, which deals with how the bill applies to ships themselves, and Division B, which deals with officers and their powers.

I do not have any particular comment about Division A, except that it is one thing to say that there is a law which applies to ships and to people who have a certain relationship to ships, but it may well be a different thing to ensure that that law is really enforced. Division A also provides that the Governor in Council may make certain regulations, and, later on, I shall have a few words to say about that.

Division B, beginning at clause 15 of Appendix III, which is Book I of the Code, deals with enforcement officers and their powers, and I have only two comments about it. One is that I hope those powers will be adequate to enable the enforcement officers and the courts to make sure that the law as finally passed is applicable and is enforced. The other is to draw attention to just one provision for penalties, and I think the comment I make in relation to it may well apply to all the other provisions for penalties. Clause 35, on page 41 of the bill, provides that if any person is “guilty of an offence” for which no other punishment is provided in the code, he shall be “liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars.”

I am not one who ordinarily argues for severe penalties, but I do find it difficult to refrain from wondering aloud whether a “fine not exceeding five thousand dollars”—which means it may be anything from nothing to $5,000—in relation to the value of a ship and its cargo, is sufficient to have very much deterrent power. I need hardly say, honourable senators, that ships are valuable, and when their cargoes are aboard and taken into account they are even more valuable. It seems to me that the maximum penalty for a violation of the law, if it is to be considered a deterrent penalty, must be high enough to bear some adequate relationship to the total value of the ship and its cargo. It should not be so small, for instance, as to encourage someone directing the conduct of a ship to say, “Well, let us do this; it will only cost us $5,000, and what is that when compared to the value of the ship and its cargo?”—and that value may be $2 million or $10 million. The committee which examines this bill, if it is given second reading as I suppose it will be, should find out whether this kind of penalty is sufficient to have the desired effect.

Book II of Schedule III is divided into Divisions A, B and C. Division A deals with the national character of a Canadian ship, its national status, its national flag, the use of a certificate of registration, its identification markings, and similar things. I agree with what I took to be the meaning of the comment of Senator Cook, that these are useful provisions to establish more clearly and significantly the national status of a Canadian ship.

Division B deals with a wide variety of matters relating to the registration of a ship, including—and this is something to which I draw particular attention—the establishment in the national capital region of a central registry for shipping.

Division C deals with the registration of mortgages on ships. As I read that division, it requires the mortgages to be registered with the registry, which, as I have said, under the provisions of the bill, is to be located in the national capital region.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that the establishment of a central registry for shipping for the whole country, from the farthest eastern port in Canada to the farthest northern and western ports and the inland region, is something new. I am not at all sure that it is an improvement on the present provision for registration, which, as I am sure all honourable senators know, may be summarized by saying that its chief characteristic, aside from its legal significance, is that it is local registration. It is convenient registration, because it can be effected quickly and easily by the appropriate federal officers in whatever port the registration is chosen to be made.

I cannot help but wonder whether this provision for a central registry is not further evidence of the all-pervading desire of some elements of government in this country to ensure that everything possible is centralized in Ottawa, that this is the place of all knowledge and wisdom. Therefore, I believe this to be something which should be examined very carefully by whatever committee deals with the bill.

There is one anomaly in the present provision as to registration which I am pleased to see is dealt with in the bill. For simply historical reasons, I suppose, registration at present is not really registration of a Canadian ship, but is the registration in Canada of a British ship, no matter whether a Canadian may own it. To that extent I concur most warmly in the proposed change that the registration shall be officially the registration of a "Canadian ship." That seems to be a real improvement.

Earlier on I said that the bill contains power to make regulations. As is all too usual, the bill before us provides what to me seems to be a very wide power to make regulations not merely of procedural or administrative meaning but of real substantive law. We do not know what will be contained in the regulations.

Much has been said in the Senate and elsewhere, and in the committee that is considering statutory instruments, about the evils inherent in this type of power. I shall not amplify what has already been said but will say merely that I believe all the criticism which has been made so often, so vigorously and, I believe, correctly, in the Senate and in committee applies equally to the regulatory power contained in this bill.

I note, however, one thing which may possibly be a sort of bow or acknowledgement in the direction of saying that perhaps some of the criticism has merit. At page 26 of the bill, clause BI-13—which means Book I, section 13—provides that a copy of any proposed regulation made under certain provisions of the act shall be published in the Canada Gazette, and shall not come into force before the expiration of 30 days from the date of publication. Where a notice of objection is filed with the minister within the 30 days, the minister may direct that an inquiry be held in relation thereto, and the regulation shall not come into force before the completion of such inquiry and a report thereon has been made.

Well, that is some improvement. It does not apply to all of the regulatory power contained in the bill, but it certainly does apply to certain aspects. As I said, I believe that to be an improvement. However, I have to question the usefulness of the provision, because it simply deals with those regulations that are published in the Canada Gazette, and which a member of the public might see and object to. With all due respect to this venerable publication, of great legal authority, it is appropriate to ask how many members of the public read it—indeed, how many members of the public ever see it? The answer is—well, to be quite sure that I am accurate, I will say only a handful. If I wished to risk exaggeration, I would say no one, except the one whose attention happens to be drawn to it. So it seems to me that this gesture, although a useful one, and one that I commend, is really not very helpful if it is designed to give members of the public knowledge of a regulation before that regulation comes into force, and the opportunity to object to it. It seems to me that the provision regarding publication should be such as to ensure that it is published in some kind of paper or document that is widely circulated among members of the public and is much more likely to be read than is the Canada Gazette.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to suggest that the bill should not now be read the second time. Although I have drawn attention to what I consider to be some shortcomings, and have perhaps been particularly vigorous about the question of a central registry and the matter of regulations, I support the general concept of the revision of the Canada Shipping Act. I exclude any reference to the provisions concerning coasting trade, which have been dropped, but I support the idea of a comprehensive Canada shipping law, and consequently I support second reading of the bill.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a few brief remarks to make on Bill C-41. After the extensive analysis of the bill by Senator Smith (Colchester), very little need be said.

This proposed legislation deals with the first two of five books to comprise the Maritime Code. The first two are non-controversial. They deal with subjects such as extending Canadian law to Canadian ships on the high seas, policing authority, legal procedures, and registration. None of those are objectionable. On the other hand, none are very earth-shaking.

The objectionable parts of the former Bill C-61 were withdrawn after strenuous objection from the Progressive Conservative opposition in the other place—PC support of objections raised by industries on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. The British Columbia forest-related industries and the maritime and agriculture industries objected to certain sections of the bill. These industries wanted to retain foreign shipping in order to be competitive in foreign markets.

On many occasions we have heard the Leader of the Government in the Senate and his deputy accuse the opposition in the other place of obstruction and delaying the passage of various bills, but Canadians on both coasts are very fortunate that the PCs took their responsibilities seriously and opposed Bill C-61. Honourable senators, this was not obstruction; they were merely carrying out their duty of attempting to improve legislation and removing from it sections that would have adversely affected certain sections of the economy. It is rather unfortunate that it took four years for the government to give consideration to the legitimate views of the opposition.

Honourable senators, I have stated that I do not consider this to be obstruction on the part of the opposition. I view it rather as an abdication of duty on the part of those supporting the government, who also have a duty to attempt to improve legislation. If those supporting the government had recognized the difficult position various Canadian industries would have been in had Bill C-61 been passed, they would have supported the Progressive Conservative Party in their opposition to it, and surely any reasonable government would have dealt with the objections put forward before four years had passed.

It is my understanding that further representations will be received before the next three bills are introduced, and I would suggest that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications can do a very useful service by receiving these representations and making recommendations to the government. I know that the committee will do an excellent job, and will also provide an opportunity for senators from such provinces as British Columbia, who voiced no objection to the bill, to redeem themselves. They may have been derelict in their duty on one occasion. I am sure they will not be again.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would tell you that, in fact, representatives from British Columbia of all parties were very active in seeking changes in this particular proposed piece of legislation. I would not accuse any member of this house or the other of being derelict in his or her duty, in any case, without knowing the facts.

Senator Phillips: Where were they active, though?

Senator Flynn: They were hard-headed, stubborn. That was before Senator Perrault was a member of the administration.

Senator Perrault: I have written many letters on this subject, I can assure you.

Hon. Senators: Question!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Lang moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Haig: Honourable senators, before the next Order of the Day is called, I wish to advise the house that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will hold a meeting tomorrow, Thursday, May 19, in the room at the back of the building known as the old library, for purposes of organization. In view of the fact that Bill C-41 would amend existing legislation, many organizations and groups wish to appear. The bill will not be considered by the committee until at least a week from this Thursday.

SOLAR ENERGY APPLICATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill C-309, intituled: "An Act respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy".—(Honourable Senator Forsey).

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I ask leave to move the second reading of this bill, in place of Senator Forsey, and to explain it to the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jack Austin moved the second reading of Bill C-309, respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy.

He said: Honourable senators, I hope I will gain the unanimous support of the Senate by promising at the outset to be brief.

Senator Flynn: You said you would explain it, though.

Senator Austin: Senator Flynn has not looked at the bill. If he had he would have seen how brief a bill it is.

Honourable senators, Bill C-309 is a private member's public bill sponsored in the House of Commons by the member for Davenport, Mr. Charles Caccia. Its purpose is to create an institute to be known as the Institute for Solar Energy Application. The institute will be an entity in the private sector and is designed by the intentment of the bill to stand as a bridge between private sector industrial research activity and government industrial research activity.

The bill provides for a board of directors, but regrettably the draftsmanship, plus some political negotiation in the House of Commons, has omitted provision for membership. It is also regrettable that some very essential items, such as definitions of "solar energy" and "renewable resources", have not been included in its provisions.

Senator Perrault: We all make mistakes.

Senator Austin: However, as in the case of many items that come from the other place, it is the duty of this chamber to improve them and see that they are effective and workable.

It is evident to all of us that during the lifetime of those now living there will be a massive change in the nature of energy employed to maintain human physical and emotional security and well-being. A number of experts have told us that the era of oil and gas as the main energy source for transportation, and the main energy source for other industrial, commercial, residential and human requirements, is coming to an end. The experts have no sense of agreement on precisely when this time may be, and there are good reasons for this disagreement. So much depends on the behaviour of people in their use of energy resources. The problem is how quickly we will consume them, and when that rate of consumption will bring us to the time of crisis. Nonetheless it is clear that oil and natural gas, in the decade or two or three ahead of us, will cease to be used as generally as today, and will become used and conserved for use in specialized and specific ways for which no substitutions, even by then, will have been developed.

Therefore it is critical for mankind to use the lead time available, whether it be 10, 20, 30 or even 50 years, to develop technologies that will provide alternate forms of energy at affordable, if not desirable, cost. These alternative forms appear in part to be available in that broad area of energy forms known as renewable energy. The renewable energy sources of promise in Canada appear to be some further hydro-electric generation, possible geothermal sources, and solar energy in its several forms, which include ocean tides and wind, as well as the ability to convert the rays of the sun.

The non-renewable energy resources are better known and understood, and are, in particular, oil, natural gas, coal and some other fossil fuel items such as oil shale, oil sands and heavy oil. Also considered to be a non-renewable energy resource is uranium, because of its finite character. Another energy mineral is thorium, which is abundant in the world but which we have not yet turned to develop because it is obtained at a higher cost than uranium.

Harnessing the sun has been one of mankind's greatest ambitions down through the ages. In small ways, of course, we have been able to do it. Such uses as concentrating the sun's rays to start fire, catching the winds in sails or on the blades of windmills, or harnessing tidal rapids, have been established in our society for ages. Now, however, we are casting our eyes with renewed interest on our ability to utilize the sun's rays and warmth for significant purposes—home heating, perhaps industrial heating, and perhaps even some day the driving of steam generators and turbines.

The experts tell us that solar energy is a form that can be made practical. Indeed, the experts are telling us that solar energy is almost practical today. There appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on May 11 last an article quoting Professor C. E. Bakus, professor of engineering at Arizona State University. Those of you who have been in Arizona know that they know something about sunshine. Part of that article reads:

Dr. C. E. Bakus . . . says the main cost factor is roof-mounted solar "collectors" that absorb energy from the sun. He predicts the present cost of $20 a square foot of installed collector will be cut in half by 1980.

If that comes to pass, solar energy for home space heating will be competitive with fuel oil.

The United States, in the current fiscal year, is spending a total of $280 million on solar research, and that money is being distributed to private research groups as well as being spent by the United States government and its agencies. In Canada, in this fiscal year, $10 million will be spent by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and by the National Research Council for the same purpose. Today in Canada we have in place and operating 21 solar heated buildings. Some of them are water storage, and others are crushed rock storage, installations. Those of you who come from Manitoba will know that there is now established on the roof of the Manitoba Legislature a solar heating unit for experimental purposes, no doubt designed to keep the temperature of the debate in the chamber as high as possible.

Senator Flynn: We have you here for that purpose.

Senator Austin: If I could convert my energy into a great deal of warmth, Senator Flynn, I would be delighted to direct it at you.

Senator Flynn: That is why it is so cold.

Senator Austin: In Prince Edward Island there is an experimental Renewable Resources Ark, which the Prime Minister inaugurated in the fall of 1976. It is a subject of great interest to the science world concerned with these problems, and has made Prince Edward Island quite famous in technological research in this sector.

In a country as cold as Canada, the acquisition of additional and compatible forms of heating would make an important contribution to our comfort as individuals and to our security of supply, as well as to our economic comfort. According to a Science Council report, most parts of Canada have enough sunshine to justify solar development.

At this point, honourable senators, I wish to repudiate that well-known Canadian slander that in Vancouver it rains all the time. It is not true. Vancouver is a beautiful, sunny part of this country. What British Columbians do is tell the rest of Canada that it rains all the time in their province because they don't want to get crowded out. The evidence I wish to give you to demonstrate my point is that the first solar home in Canada was built in 1971 in Vancouver. It is a space-heated solar home and provides about 50 per cent of the space heating requirements of that house.

Senator Smith (Colchester): A small house.

Senator Austin: The additional comment I would make is that it was built entirely by private funds by a private enterpriser with scientific curiosity, and not subsidized by the government. I think the gentleman in question deserves some recognition for his foresight.

There are other forms of renewable energy that also deserve research. They are geothermal energy, bio-mass—which has been the subject of considerable interest by the Honourable Alvin Hamilton in the other place—and the ocean tides, which always concern our colleagues from Nova Scotia.

Bill C-309, introduced by Charles Caccia, the member of Parliament for Davenport, has been passed by the House of Commons, and was examined by its Natural Resources and Public Works Committee at two sessions held on Wednesday, March 30, and Tuesday, April 5, 1977.

Senator Flynn: Did that committee not notice the defects in the bill that you mentioned at the beginning of your speech?

Senator Austin: I appreciate your observation, honourable senator. In fact, they paid a lot of attention to valuable issues, and disregarded these mundane technical issues that make things go.

Senator Flynn: They thought we would look after them.

Senator Austin: I think the Senate has a reputation for correcting the errors of the other place.

Senator Flynn: That is quite mundane.

Senator Austin: The interest shown in the House of Commons demonstrates the growing recognition by Canadians of the need for a larger degree of activity and priority in this area, and indeed for a higher degree of public education about the energy crisis and what can be achieved by the utilization of renewable energy resources.

Honourable senators, I believe that this bill deserves examination in committee. I understand that the appropriate committee of the Senate would be the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I have been assured by its chairman, Senator Hayden, that should the Senate pass this bill on second reading and refer it to his committee, he would be pleased to hold an appropriate hearing on its provisions.

Some very interesting legal points arise out of a bill of this type. While I propose no lecture in law during these comments, I think honourable senators would be interested to know the problems that come from, for example, the right of access to the sun by landholders. There are many illustrations in our society of someone building an edifice next to another and completely blocking out its sunlight. When solar energy has not been important to our society that has not seemed to matter. If solar energy becomes important there will be many law suits relating to access to sunlight. Of course, we can see the necessity for unitization of access to sunlight, as takes place, for example, in the gathering of oil.

The other legal problem that arises with respect to renewable energy resources is access to wind. I make no reference in this chamber to myself in that regard. Wind power can be a very important source of energy, as many who come from the prairies understand and appreciate. Again the problems of construction can eliminate proper access to that source.

The most critical part of this bill, and the chief object of its attention, is to capture something in the way of the industrial spin-off that will come from work on solar energy. The Science Council believes that it will cost an estimated $11 billion to have about 10 per cent of our energy requirements sourced in the renewable sector. Eleven billion dollars, honourable senators, is a lot of money, and the choice for Canada is whether we are going to spend that money on acquiring outside technology—that is, transferring our money to buy labour and research from other countries—or whether we are going to spend at least a reasonable portion of that money at home in developing technology which we can sell overseas. If we can make complicated aircraft, complicated nuclear reactors and complicated electronic equipment, this is a cinch, but it needs our time and attention.

We have done some work in the commercial sector here. We have done work in longer-term thermal storage, solar-powered air conditioning, vertical-axis wind generators, honeycomb solar collectors and heat pumps. Much more must be done.

Honourable senators, I wish to conclude by simply saying that the purpose of the reference to committee, which I hope the house will agree to, is to allow experts to come forward and tell their story. If this bill has the favour of this chamber, and a few technical amendments are made and approved by the House of Commons, we shall have in this country an institute which would co-ordinate research directed to industrial development.

Senator Flynn: How will it be funded?

Senator Austin: It will be funded by the private sector, and the governments of Canada and the provinces. However, there is no guarantee that any of those sectors will fund it. This bill would simply create an institute which can be a source of co-ordination in this area. You will remember the famous reply attributed to the scientist Faraday when he was asked, "What good is this electricity that you have discovered?" He asked, "What good is a baby?" I hope that this institute will grow to be a very big boy in the development of solar energy in Canada.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if the sponsor of the bill would indicate to the Senate its status. Does it come to us as a private member's public bill, or is it sponsored and supported by the government?

Senator Austin: Senator, it comes to us, as I said at the outset, as a private member's public bill, and is not sponsored by the government.

Senator Grosart: Is it supported by the government?

Senator Austin: It was passed by the other place, so at least they did not deny it some accommodation.

Senator Grosart: Sometimes bills do pass the other place which are not supported by the government.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might direct a question to the sponsor of the bill with reference to his comment, as I understood it, that it would cost a total of $11 billion to develop certain renewable resources? I wonder what he includes in the phrase "renewable resources"?

Senator Austin: As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I include in "renewable resources" solar energy, tidal energy, wind energy and new hydro-electric sources of energy in Canada. Those are, generally, included in the definition of "renewable resources."

Senator Flynn: Windmills.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Might I ask further if the amount of $11 billion is an estimate of what it would cost to make maximum use all those resources?

Senator Austin: Yes, the Science Council report said that we need to depend more on renewable resources, and that to obtain about a 10 per cent reliance on renewable resources in Canada by the year 2000 would require an investment of $11 billion.

Senator Flynn: Part of those resources is the wind, for instance, through the use of windmills. How much would that represent?

Senator Austin: In my opinion, senator, a very small part, in spite of some of our mutual friends.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the sponsor of the bill if he excludes nuclear energy from his phrase "renewable resources," particularly in view of the fact that some of the new technology in the nuclear field is very definitely renewable?

Senator Austin: Senator, the term "renewable resources" is not inclusive of nuclear energy. The source of that energy, uranium, is a finite source. However, I do appreciate what you say because—and I know you have this in mind—the breeder reactor is a continual system reactor.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FINANCE

NOTICE OF CANCELLATION OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment of the house I would inform honourable senators that the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance scheduled for this afternoon has been cancelled.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 19, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

SIR ROBIN VANDERFELT, K.B.E., SECRETARY GENERAL OF THE COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on behalf of the members of the Senate I should like to extend our warmest welcome to a most distinguished visitor, Sir Robin Vanderfelt, K.B.E., Secretary General of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1972-1569, dated July 13, 1972, revoking the Direction to the Canadian Radio-Television Commission made by Order in Council P.C. 1970-992, dated June 4, 1970, as amended, together with Direction respecting ineligibility to hold broadcasting licences in substitution therefor, pursuant to section 27 of the Broadcasting Act, Chapter B-11, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of document respecting the Canadian Coast Guard National Marine Emergency Plan, issued by the Department of Transport.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, 25th May, 1977, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 24, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to give you a brief outline of the Senate work scheduled for next week. I shall deal first with the committees. This, as you know, is subject to change should some of the bills now before the Senate be referred to committee.

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet at 2.30 in the afternoon on Tuesday to continue its examination of Canada's relations with the United States.

On Wednesday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet in camera at 9.30 a.m. and again at 2.30 p.m. to consider the white paper on banking legislation. The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet at 3.30, or when the Senate rises, to hear witnesses in connection with its inquiry into the beef industry, and there will be a meeting of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy, also at 3.30 p.m. or when the Senate rises.

Five committee meetings have been set down for Thursday, as follows: Foreign Affairs on Canada-U.S. relations at 9.30 a.m.; Transport and Communications on Bill C-41 at 10 a.m.; the subcommittee of Health, Welfare and Science on experiences in prenatal life and early childhood which may cause personality disorders or criminal behaviour, in camera, at 10.30 a.m.; Internal Economy, in camera at 11 a.m.; and the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments at 3.30 p.m.

In the Senate, of course, we will continue with the legislation now before us, and other items on the order paper. In addition, we can expect two bills from the House of Commons, Bill C-54, to amend the Excise Tax Act (No. 2), and Bill C-47, to amend the Export Development Corporations Act.

We have a lot of business on hand, and it would appear that the workload will increase substantially as we approach the summer season. It may very well be that over the course of the next few weeks it will be necessary for the Senate to sit on Monday evenings.

Senator Flynn: What is the target date for the summer recess?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government is not so much concerned or obsessed with the establishment of a fixed date for the summer recess as it is in expeditiously looking after the pressing needs of the Canadian people. It is hoped, however, that it may be possible to adjourn Parliament by the end of June.

Senator Flynn: The government, it appears, would like to have all items on the order paper disposed of very quickly, without debate.

Senator Perrault: On the contrary. The honourable senator is more knowledgeable about the attitude of the government side in this place than to make a comment of that kind. There are indications that, due to the heavy load of proposed legislation in the other place, we may be sitting during the month of July. I do not put that forth in any sense as a threat; that is merely my assessment of the situation as it exists. I believe all parties have agreed that the general target, however, would be the end of June, but there is no assurance at this time that that target can be met.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill C-207, intituled: "An Act to amend the Railway Act".—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave, I yield to Senator Bosa.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the second reading of Bill C-207, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-207 is a private member's bill which seeks to amend the Railway Act so as to make railways more responsive to public needs. The bill, if passed, would require that a public announcement be made by the railways 30 days in advance of any reactivation of an abandoned line or abandonment of lines, or expansion of existing lines located within 1,000 feet of residential, commercial or public buildings. That period of notice would enable interested taxpayers to make representations to the Canadian Transport Commission and the commission, in turn, may require the railways to submit its formal plans for such work and/or conduct a public hearing into the matter.

This is a non-controversial bill. It was adopted by the other place without opposition. If honourable senators are agreeable, assuming the bill is adopted in principle, I would be pleased to move that it be referred to the appropriate committee for more detailed examination.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

BANK ACT

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 17, the debate on the motion of Senator Macnaughton for the second reading of Bill C-39, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, Bill C-39 would defer the normal decennial examination of the Bank Act, and continue its provisions to March 31, 1978.

I voice again a rather chronic complaint that I have about the presentation of bills from the other house. In this bill, as passed after third reading by the other house, there is no explanatory note.

The first reading version of this bill proposed that we defer until not later than January 1, 1978, the rights and authority under our legislation for banks to carry on. By subsequent action of the other place, an amendment in the Committee of the Whole, that date was changed to March 31, 1978. I still think that on the right-hand pages of bills that are presented to us we should have some information of this type.

I want to pay a tribute to the sponsor of the bill, Senator Macnaughton. I have observed that as vice-chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee he has asked acute and sagacious questions about a number of related bills that that committee has under consideration, including the white paper concerning banking and Bill C-42 which would amend the Combines Investigation Act. There is also in Bill C-42 a proposed amendment to the Bank Act. Of course, all of this work is being carried on before it is opportune for us to discuss the bills formally, and it is being carried on under the prodigious and titanic legal leadership of Senator Hayden, the chairman of the committee. I note that the committee has been sitting in camera, and I have received advice that in camera they are considering their report on the white paper on banking, and within a very short time we will have the benefit of their studies.

Honourable senators, I rise to speak on Bill C-39, which is brief and would merely extend the provisions of the Bank Act, because it may be forgotten that on April 7, 1971, I proposed and introduced a private bill that was not proceeded with. It was a bill that, in my opinion, indicated there should be a little more stringent regulation to ensure competition in this very important industrial business field of banking. I did not proceed with the bill because I was informed that in that same year—that is, 1971—the government itself would introduce a new bill in the area of competition. They did. It was Bill C-256, and it was not proceeded with.

My feeling was that there was too much immobility and lack of competition in this particular industry. I think that subsequently some of that view has been supported. I would quote briefly from the white paper with respect to banking, which was presented in August 1976. It had this to say:

—since the last (Bank Act) revision, the profitability of the chartered banks as a group has been relatively strong. An adequate level of competition will help ensure that banking services are provided throughout the nation at the lowest cost to borrowers and the highest return to savers that are consistent with the survival and healthy growth of the country's financial system.

With that, of course, I have no quarrel.

Honourable senators will recall that we had a very substantial bill in the long session of 1974-76, Bill C-2, which, among other things, amended the Bank Act. But it stated that competion in the field of banking would still remain under the Bank Act. In the last major revision of the Bank Act in 1967, there were certain important changes to section 138 which I heartily approved, but there was little change insofar as sanctions or criminal penalties are concerned. Now if we go forward and pass Bill C-42 this session, there will be an accomplishment of some of the points that were contemplated in my bill of 1971. Indeed, since my 1971 bill, insofar as a combine is concerned, we have already provided in the 1974-76 session that instead of simply a fine of $10,000, if there was an agreement among banks as to fixing rates to be charged to borrowers, there would be liability to imprisonment for two years. As I say, there is in Bill C-42, which is also under study at the present time by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the very point I raised in 1971, that in the interests of consumers banks should be under the Combines Investigation Act. Bill C-42, of course, provides that the title of the act will be changed to "the Competition Act." Nonetheless, these bills are before us, and I take the opportunity to say that this was part of what I had in mind in my bill of 1970-71, which was rather deprecated at the time of introduction.

On March 16 last, when Bill C-42 was introduced, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Honourable Mr. Abbott, in a press release stated:

As outlined in the White Paper on Canadian Banking Legislation issued last August by the Minister of Finance, it is proposed that sections in the Bank Act covering competition among chartered banks be transferred to the Competition Act. The responsibility for monitoring compliance with those provisions would also be shifted from the Inspector General of Banks to the Competition Policy Advocate.

There are various background papers respecting Bill C-42 which we must consider also as we consider the advisability of extending the existing Bank Act. In connection with one of those background papers, the following was stated in March 1977:

The Economic Council recommended that the unregulated activities of regulated industries should be subject to the Combines Investigation Act.

The background paper itself then suggested that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should undertake research to review the quality of performance, and so on, of regulated industries.

As you know, up to now that activity has not been operative in respect to the banking industry subject to the Bank Act. Although chartered banks have been exempt from the Combines Investigation Act—and I have mentioned that section 128 of the Bank Act was revised specifically in 1967 in order to prevent collusion among banks on the prices of either loans or payments on deposits—this prohibition seemingly has not notably affected both the timing of rate changes and, in certain markets, the frequency of rate changes.

Prior to the Bank Act revisions of 1967, all banks simultaneously announced changes in the prime rate and the rate paid on savings deposits. I have observed that since then rate changes between banks, and between different types of loans and deposits, have been staggered with some small lags ranging from several days to several weeks. It should be noted, however, that the introduction of lags does not necessarily imply what one could call competitive pricing. Whether or not there is at present competition between chartered banks in both the borrowing and lending rates is still open to debate. No authoritative study has been made to offer irrefutable proof one way or the other.

Subsequent to the last important revision of the Bank Act in 1967, the chartered banks raised their general consumer lending rate from the previous legal ceiling of 6 per cent to 12 per cent. That rate was maintained until May 1974, at which time the consumer lending rate was increased to its present level of 13½ per cent. Between January 1967 and May 1974 the Bank of Canada rate varied between 4½ per cent and 8 per cent, without any change in the consumer loan rate. It is the immobility of the rate on consumer loans that is the purpose of my remarks today.

However, in May 1974 the bank rate rapidly increased beyond the 8 per cent level, and in response the chartered banks increased the consumer loan rate by one and a half percentage points to the 13½ per cent to which I have referred. From May 1974 until May 7, 1977 the Bank of Canada rate has varied between 7½ per cent, the current rate, and 9½ per cent, while the banks' consumer loan rate has held steadily over this period at 13½ per cent.

My main concern, as I have said, is that we should see something more tangible, more convincing, in the way of competition in this all-important economic area of financial institutions. It is heartening that very recently—and for the first time, I think—we have seen something more assuring. It has been more satisfying to me personally since I introduced that bill in 1971. We have had four Bank of Canada interest rate reduction signals since last November. On November 24 the bank rate went down from 9½ per cent to 9 per cent. As always, interest payments to non-chequeable savings account deposits dropped accordingly. We had another reduction on December 29, 1976, from 9 per cent to 8½ per cent; on February 23, 1977, from 8½ per cent to 8 per cent, and on May 6 last the bank rate dropped from 8 per cent to 7½ per cent. I think, honourable senators, you will have observed that these reductions not only affect fairly rapidly the interest that you and I are paid on non-chequeable savings deposits, but are also rapidly translated into costs of borrowers in the commercial field, and generally in the mortgage field.

What I say is heartening is that for the first time in my recollection—and in 1954, as Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance, I had something to do with the conduct of the decennial Bank Act change of that year—I see some reassuring evidence of competition for consumer loans. To me, competition in most industries is a very healthy thing. I point out that, although we will not now be able to amend the Bank Act itself until perhaps next year, at least one of the chartered banks—but not a major chartered bank, and not one of the “Big Five” who have 90 per cent of the assets—has broken from the fold and, as far as I know, for the first time unilaterally has announced a reduction in its charges for consumer loans from 13½ per cent to 13 per cent.

I talk today especially of competition. This involves near banks and other financial institutions. The banking white paper referred to these other institutions, trust companies, finance companies, caisses populaires, and the like, and I also noted with considerable interest that at least one trust company—in this case a large one—said on May 11 that it would lower its consumer loan rate not by one-half of one per cent following that amount of change in the Bank of Canada rate but by a full one per cent from 13½ per cent to 12½ per cent. Any other mover or shaker?

Senator Choquette: It is still high, is it not? Why do these banks not follow the directives of the Bank of Canada? The Bank of Canada plays with the interest rate and when you go to a bank it will charge you 12 per cent, 12½ per cent or 14 per cent. I do not know why the Bank of Canada should not have some power over these people. If the honourable senator has the answer, I should like to hear it.

Senator Benidickson: That would require, I believe, new legislation. According to Bill C-42 it would perhaps come under the powers of the Competition Director. Insofar as banking is concerned, this would come under the Inspector General of Banks, and I do not think he has such power. It would be up to you and me, senator, to make such comments when we receive the decennial major revision of the Bank Act, which will be deferred by this bill to March 31, 1978, at the latest.

I would point out that the chartered banks were not under a legal maximum interest rate—a big element in the making of consumer loans. In 1967 personal loans by chartered banks—my authority is the Bank of Canada Review, February 1977, provided by the Library of Parliament—amounted to something like $3.5 billion. At the end of 1976 the figure for “personal loans” was over $17 billion. So that area must be profitable. I have pointed out that that is the one area lending where there has been too obvious immobility in the interest cost charge.

The honourable senator asked why the Bank of Canada or some other authority does not exercise some force. I believe that the entry of the chartered banks into this consumer loan field has, to an extent, been beneficial to the little consumer borrower, and I think the figures relating to their share of this lending bear that out. The banks’ share in this area now exceeds 52 per cent.

The Bank of Canada Review, March 1977, under “Consumer Credit” on page 50, shows that from the end of 1967 to the end of 1976 the total of the chartered banks’ personal loans increased from $2.9 billion to $16.1 billion. However, what I wished to demonstrate to Senator Choquette was that in that period the role of the chartered banks in the field of consumer lending increased tremendously. They now have approximately 50 per cent of the consumer loan business, but, admittedly, their charge for consumer loans is less than that which the finance companies and other institutions charged when the field was left to them.

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Macnaughton speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I just wish to take this opportunity to thank Senator Benidickson for a most interesting contribution to this debate. I do not believe I can usefully add anything further. If it is your desire to refer this bill to committee, well and good. Frankly, I do not see any reason for it, having regard to the fact that the bill simply extends the period in which the banks may carry on business. However, I am in the hands of the Senate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Macnaughton moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 17, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault, calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

Hon. David Gordon Steuart: Honourable senators, to begin my first speech in this chamber I wish to tell you that I consider it a great privilege to have been called to the Senate. I wish to thank and assure those who made it possible that I will do my utmost to merit their confidence. I also wish to thank Madam Speaker, all honourable senators and members of the staff who have given me such a warm welcome and been so helpful.

I am pleased that my first speech is on the vital issue of national unity, and my congratulations go to Senator Perrault for his timely motion and outstanding speech. I hope we make sure that his address is given the widest possible coverage, because I am convinced it will inspire a new sense of purpose in all those who hear or read it to hold this country together no matter what their racial background is or where they live in Canada. Since what we, along with other Canadians, do in the next few months may well decide the very future of our nation, we should take full part in this debate and then follow through immediately with action.

Honourable senators, I feel that the time has come when we must be prepared to stand up and be counted, to put on record clearly and courageously our own views and the feelings of the various regions of Canada that we represent. I am aware that my viewpoint on the questions of Quebec separatism and national unity will not reflect the thinking of all Saskatchewan people, but since I have visited with and talked to people in every corner of that province, what I have to say will represent a good deal of public opinion in my home province. Those who disagree with me can speak for themselves, and I hope they do. Surely this is our responsibility as senators, and to do less at this time would be to give fresh ammunition to those who criticize this institution.

I am also convinced that the only credential anyone needs to speak out for national unity is his Canadian citizenship, regardless of whether he was born here or just became a Canadian. Canada belongs to all Canadians and every Canadian has a full stake in every part of this great country. To take the attitude that only those living in Quebec have the right or responsibility to take part in discussions leading up to the referendum in that province is not only folly but, in my opinion, it is dangerous folly. It is true that when the talking is done, when the debates are all finished, only the citizens of Quebec will vote on the question of staying in Canada or going it alone. But surely in the meantime, honourable senators, all Canadians who care about their country must do everything they can to convince the people of Quebec that we need them, that we want them, and that only by working and living together can we continue to build a nation whose goals are freedom, justice, equality and prosperity for all our citizens.

While I am hopeful and extremely optimistic that the vast majority of Quebec people will opt to stay in Canada, for the information of those who are thinking of voting in favour of separating I want to put two observations on record, observations that are my own but also ones that have been passed on to me by a great many western Canadians. The first has to do with the so-called economic union between Canada and the possible new state of Quebec being advanced by René Lévesque and some of his ministers. I can tell them it won't happen. There is no way that the people of Canada would allow their government to negotiate a nice, friendly, economic, free trade union with a group of people who just voted to break up the country. It's like a friendly, civilized divorce—it happens in story books but very seldom in real life. René Lévesque knows it won't happen and I am convinced that he is trying to lull the people of Quebec into a false sense of security. I think it is essential that the leaders from all parts of Canada set the record straight on this important question so that the people of Quebec will know exactly where they stand before they vote.

The other point I want to make is that even though a Canada without Quebec is almost unthinkable, if it happens we will survive. I detest the so-called "break-up game" that is being played by some people, especially some people in the news media. You've all heard it: the Maritimes will join the United States, Ontario will go its own way, B.C. will become independent, and so on. Most Canadians love this country just the way it is, but, if one member of the family pulls out, the rest of us, I am convinced, will remain united, more determined than ever to make real the dreams of the men and women who came from all over the world to build a better home here in Canada. Having said that, I don't want to talk any more or even think any more of the possibility of the division of Canada, just of uniting it and working to make it stronger.

I want to talk about Saskatchewan, what we owe the people of Quebec and that we are going to try to convince them of our sincerity when we say we want them to stay in Canada. I want to talk about some of the things we can and must do in this country if we are to use the breathing space we have been given before the people of Quebec make up their minds about Canada. I call it a breathing space. In fact, I believe we will get it in two stages: the first is between now and the referendum; the second will be between the first referendum and the second, which I believe will take place if we do not change our ways. We only have one or possibly two years before the first referendum in Quebec. It is not much time, but if we use it wisely it will be enough to convince most Quebecers that we want them to stay with us. If this happens and the vote is in favour of Canada, we had better not go back to sleep content in the knowledge that Canada is safe and united for all time.

The separatists will continue to work. And make no mistake: they have many dedicated and intelligent people in their camp who will never quit until either we convince them, or most of them, that we have corrected their legitimate grievances, or they bring about the separation of Quebec.

The second breather, if we are given it, will be longer than the first and will give us time to set right some of the misunderstandings that are very old and go very deep, both inside and outside Quebec. All this, both the short and the long term adjustments that must be made by both francophone and non-francophone Canadians is, of course, dependent upon goodwill. We will only stay united if we are prepared to understand each other and take a new look at all the institutions making up our country, in a spirit of give and take.

Since I feel we should deal in particular with our own provinces, I will try to show how the people of Saskatchewan have already demonstrated a spirit in bringing about changes to show recognition of the bilingual nature of Canada. I will also point out some serious changes that I feel must take place in the attitude of our government, in our educational system, and in the news media if we hope to see more acceptance of bilingualism and biculturalism in all parts of Canada.

To begin with, Saskatchewan was removed from the Northwest Territories and became a province in 1905. Among other qualifications laid down before a territory could become a province, there was a proviso that some kind of school system and hospital system must exist in the proposed new province. Saskatchewan had these, thanks in great measure to the French Canadian priests and nuns who came west from Quebec before the turn of the century. That they were prepared to make these facilities available to the new province played a significant role in the agreement to set up the province of Saskatchewan. Thus, from the very beginning that province owed a debt to the people of Quebec. Unfortunately, this fact has been largely ignored by succeeding provincial governments, the educational system and the press, during most of the 72 years that have followed.

During these same years the francophone community has played a role in governmental, cultural, educational and religious life in Saskatchewan far in excess of that which their numbers appear to justify. In actual numbers the francophones rank behind the people whose basic stock is British, German and Ukrainian in the province of Saskatchewan. They are, in fact, a small minority of our population. I point this out, honourable senators, first to pay tribute to the contribution made by French Canadians to the building of our province, and also to place in proper context the problem that any government in Saskatchewan has when it wishes to grant privileges to the French Canadians that it is not prepared to give, or not able to give, to German or Ukrainian Canadians or, indeed, to any of the other many ethnic minorities.

It is all very well to say, "Yes, but the French and English languages have special status in Canada not given to the German, Ukrainian or Polish languages, or any of the other mother tongues spoken by the millions of Canadians who came here from all over the world." The history of the special status of the languages of the two founding races is not well known in Saskatchewan, and as a result has not been well accepted. A review of Canadian history will make the reason for this lack of knowledge clear, and, I believe, places the blame on the governments, the school system and the press.

The Quebec Act of 1774, and the British North America Act, one hundred years later, gave special status to the French language in Quebec. Subsequent action by the federal government, in 1966, began the establishment of functional bilingualism in the federal public service. In the 10 years that have followed, the federal government has stepped up its drive to achieve a position that is best described by section 2 of the Official Languages Act of 1969. This paragraph could be described as the act's cornerstone, and I quote from it as follows:

The English and French languages are the official languages of Canada for all purposes of the Parliament and Government of Canada, and possess and enjoy equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all the institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada.

And so, honourable senators, there you have it: a bilingual time bomb was set in 1867 with the passage of the British North America Act. The fuse was inserted 100 years later when Prime Minister Pearson delivered a policy statement in the House of Commons launching functional bilingualism in the federal public service. The fuse was lit by the Official Languages Act in 1969. The first series of explosions came with such things as the air controllers' strike over French in the air over Quebec, the English backlash to their perception that French was being shoved down their throats, the French backlash to what they perceived as intolerance on the part of non-francophone Canadians, and finally, the election of the Parti Québécois and its dedication to pulling Quebec out of Confederation.

Honourable senators, how did we Canadians, a basically reasonable and tolerant people, get into such a mess, where we are almost at each other's throat and are seriously talking about breaking up the country? I think we have to look at how we got into the mess if we hope to find a way out.

We all know that this is a very complex problem which took a long time to develop; the solution may be equally complex, but we are running out of time and I feel we have to attack this problem on all fronts.

I am only going to deal with education, or the lack of it, and try to point the way towards some changes that I believe will help bring about a better understanding among all Canadians.

In 1867, when the B.N.A. Act was written and Canada became a country, the population numbered two or three million people, and apart from the Indians and Inuits, most, or almost all, were of British or French stock. I am sure that few of them were aware of the content or the philosophy of what was to become Canada's Constitution. Since then we have grown to 23 million people and we have welcomed people from almost every corner of the globe. Today, nearly one-third of our population is of neither French nor British origin, but in spite of having encouraged millions of immigrants to become Canadians, the federal government has, until the last few years, failed miserably even to acquaint them with the basic facts of our two founding races.

Most of these newcomers were convinced that they were coming to an English country, and only those who settled in Quebec ever learned any different until the last ten years. For many years successive Quebec governments have been critical of the federal immigration policy which, it was believed, did not reflect the linguistic and cultural duality of Canada as a whole, or even adequately inform potential immigrants that Quebec was a French-speaking province.

It was not until the early 1960s that federal immigration policy began to respond to Quebec's complaints. A special effort was made to increase immigration from francophone countries, and over the past few years the briefing of foreign service officers who interview immigrants abroad, and the literature on Canada made available to immigrants, was made to reflect the Canadian cultural duality more accurately. Nevertheless, until the publication in 1976 called "Introduction to Canada" and its French equivalent, almost all publications and briefings made available to immigrants abroad limited Canada's French linguistic and cultural facets to Quebec alone.

As a result, it is very likely that immigrants who planned to settle outside Quebec would not have been informed that the "French fact" was not restricted to Quebec or that French Canadians were not just another ethnic majority. In addition, most of the brochures were only available in English and French. Since they were not published in the language of the immigrant, it would have made it very difficult or even impossible for most immigrants to read them, and hence to know, even, that Quebec itself was 80 per cent French-speaking. Recently the literature given out to our immigrants has been more factual, and has informed them of the dual nature of our country.

So here, then, is the way we have failed to educate our new Canadians. For about the first 100 years our immigrants were given little or no information about the political, linguistic and cultural organization of this nation.

Can you imagine the CPR, when it was recruiting cheap labour from Central Europe, worrying about the French fact, or any other fact, for that matter—that is, other than that the immigrants would work long hours for low wages? For the next 20 or 30 years we gave our new Canadians very little more information, leaving most of them in total ignorance regarding the true nature of Canada.

Let us examine the situation as it applies to Saskatchewan. Next to the British, most of our immigrants since 1905 have been German, Ukrainian, Polish, Russian and Scandinavian. They settled in the province of Saskatchewan, broke the land, built the railroads, the towns and cities, accepted English as their new language and became fine citizens. Then a few years ago we began to push the bilingual program. French appeared on the cereal boxes, on Air Canada advertisements, in our national parks and in the broadcasts from our French television station in Regina. Many of these people had a bad reaction. They had never been prepared for it. They did not understand it, with the result that they felt threatened. There was an unfortunate backlash. It was played up by the press. In fact, I feel it was overplayed. Nevertheless, it was there to a marked degree.

I can hear some people saying, "But surely many of these people are second and third generation Canadians, and even most of the new Canadians have children in our school system. Surely they would learn the facts about Canada from their school curriculum." Up until 1966, there was no emphasis placed on the teaching of French in elementary or high schools in the province of Saskatchewan. Although it was taught in many schools, it was not available in most, and the level of instruction was so poor and so dull that far more turned against it than ever became proficient in it. As a sidelight, I can tell you that the teaching of French is so bad in Saskatchewan that most graduates from the school system think that John Diefenbaker has a good French accent. That should give you some rough idea of the level of instruction, and John Diefenbaker, I think, were the truth told, learned his French in Ontario.

The use of French as the language of instruction was illegal anywhere in the province of Saskatchewan until 1966. As for the teaching of social studies or history in Saskatchewan up until the last few years, if any student in our elementary system learned that Canada was a bilingual country, he or she did so by accident. In fact, a study of the elementary school systems across Canada indicated that even to this day the general school policy of some provinces does not include among its objectives an emphasis on the fact that Canada is a bilingual country. When I went to school we learned more about almost every other country than we did about Canada. Unfortunately, things do not appear to have changed all that much.

In response to public criticism, the provinces have begun to introduce at the elementary level more courses stressing Canadian history. Ontario, for example, has drafted a revised curriculum guideline which will offer a two-year program in Canadian history for grades 7 and 8. Better late than never. The stated aims of these courses do not include, however, an emphasis on the linguistic duality of Canada, and discussion of course units only refers to English-French relations in passing.

There has been some improvement in the teaching of the French language in every province, including Saskatchewan. A study of the school systems across Canada indicates that in the last 10 years there has been a general acceptance of French as a language of instruction and as a second language.

For over 100 years, the Province of Quebec has had a most enlightened policy towards the language of its English-speaking minority. It is ironic and to be regretted that, as the rest of Canada moves towards a greater recognition of French, Quebec is moving, or appears to be moving, in the opposite direction in its attitude towards the English language. But here again, in Quebec we have seen the failure of governments and the press, I believe, to inform the people of that province that at long last the rest of Canada is beginning to give the French language the status it deserves in a bilingual country.

There can be no doubt that when the Pearson government launched its program to increase the use of French in the Public Service it was sincere, and the move was backed by all political parties. The endeavour to make it possible for French-speaking Canadians to be understood in their own language when dealing with their own federal government 100 years after Confederation was long overdue. The follow-up by the Trudeau government through the Official Languages Act was natural and, again, supported by all parties in Parliament.

No one could hold these two administrations to blame for the failure of a long succession of federal and provincial governments to educate our immigrants and our young people as to the true nature of the duality of Canada. However, they must shoulder a measure of the blame for launching bilingualism and biculturalism without making a serious effort to enlist the aid of the provinces and the news media in an all-out educational program to achieve acceptance by the Canadian people. The provincial governments and the media must also share the blame, for while they paid lip service to Canadian unity they spent more time criticizing the obvious failures of the two programs, with little effort on their part to make them work.

I was a member of a provincial administration, and we also brought about some overdue reforms to encourage the use and teaching of French in our elementary and high schools as well as at the university level. Our efforts, like those of other governments, were too little and too late.

In spite of all our bungling, I believe we still have time, and, what's more important, the majority of Canadians are more prepared to listen with an open mind than they ever were before. The shock of the Parti-Québécois victory made Canadians face the harsh fact that Quebec might pull out of Confederation because too many Quebecers were questioning the future of their language, culture and position in this country.

The feeling of antagonism towards the bilingual program in Saskatchewan and, I am sure, in the rest of non-francophone Canada, has died down and the people are ready to listen. They have not necessarily changed their minds, but they are more receptive than ever before to listen to the reasons why we must recognize the fact that if this country is to survive with Quebec as a member province, bilingualism in French and English must be accepted. Make no mistake, this will only be accepted by the people if they are given the historical facts in a way that they can understand and accept. Speeches by our leaders will help, but I am convinced that a massive campaign by all governments, our educators and the mass media, must be started as soon as possible to educate and re-educate the people of Canada in the truth about our own history.

I am sure there is no other country in the world like Canada, where the general level of education is so high and the knowledge of its own history so low. I do not believe we can have great hopes for the future if we are not proud of our past, and it is impossible to feel anything about the building of this nation if we do not know the true story. Let us take action, and take it now, to correct this unhappy situation, and then challenge governments, educators and the media to use their tremendous potential to give Canadians a sense and an appreciation of their own history so that together we can build a united and worthwhile nation.

Honourable senators, let me say in closing that I do not believe the answer to a united Canada lies in having the central government give more powers to the provinces. In fact, never in the history of Canada have the provinces been given more power and more help from the federal government, and never have we seen more quarrelling and back-biting between the two levels of government. This country will not be saved by tinkering with the levers of power. It will only be saved by a new sense of accommodation and dedication by people from every walk of life, from every racial background and from every part of Canada.

NOTICE OF POSTPONEMENT OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Haig: Honourable senators, I wish to announce that there will be no meeting of the Transport and Communications Committee this Thursday, as scheduled, owing to the unavoidable absence of one of the senior officials of the Ministry of Transport. That meeting will now take place a week from this coming Thursday at 10 a.m., at which time the committee will consider the Maritime Code Bill.

JAMES BAY AND NORTHERN QUEBEC NATIVE CLAIMS SETTLEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Hayden, for the second reading of the Bill C-9, intituled: "An Act to approve, give effect to and declare valid certain agreements between the Grand Council of the Crees (of Quebec), the Northern Quebec Inuit Association, the Government of Quebec, la Société de la Baie James, la Société de développement de la Baie James, la Commission hydro-électrique de Québec and the Government of Canada and certain other related agreements to which the Government of Canada is a party".—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, when I adjourned this debate it was my understanding that certain other honourable senators wished to take part in it. Since no one has come forward to indicate he or she wishes to do so, I now yield to Senator Bourget.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Bourget speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

[Translation]

Senator Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators, I am sorry Senator Adams is not here, but I hope he has the opportunity, either in committee or on third reading, to make the comments he intended to make on this bill.

First, I want to thank Senator Asselin for his interesting remarks and also to tell him he proved once again to be a skilled debater.

During his speech Senator Asselin raised several points on which I would like to comment briefly tonight. He said first that the federal government chose to let the native people fight alone and, at that time, not to take any action. To this I want to say that this government, through its policy statement of 1973, was the first formally to recognize the Indians' rights of usufruct in some parts of Canada. The James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement is the first comprehensive settlement of our times.

Moreover, I want to add that the then minister, the Hon. Jean Chrétien, said that his position had not been one of neutrality, but of participation. He met several times with the Quebec Premier to convince him of the need to negotiate a settlement with the Indians. We must also remember that the federal government gave financial assistance to the Crees and the Inuit when they took their case to court. If the Indians initiated legal proceedings, it was at their own explicit request.

In addition, in July 1973, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development suggested to the Quebec government several clauses to be included in the agreement and which, in fact, appeared in the offer made by Premier Bourassa in January 1974. From May 1974, officials from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development took part in the negotiations on a regular basis until the agreement was signed on November 11, 1975.

The signing of the James Bay Agreement does not mean a transfer of responsibilities as provided for in section 91 of our Constitution. According to the agreement, the federal government will have jurisdiction over lands classified 1A and the Crees and the Inuit living on the territory will still get the same programs and the same services as the other native people of Canada. Some of the benefits granted to the Crees and related to local administration and to the land are not included in the present Indian Act; that is why the federal government intends to present later on to Parliament a new federal legislation on lands classified 1A.

The agreement also increases provincial responsibility towards the native population as well as a greater control by the natives over their own affairs. Greater participation of the provinces in Indian affairs should be taken as a positive attitude and should in no way be considered as a breach of federal responsibilities.

[English]

With respect to native third parties not signatory to the agreement, I would like to put into proper perspective certain comments which have been made throughout the debate on Bill C-9. There are at present 12,600 natives residing within the territory covered by the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement. Of that number, 11,400 are signatories to the agreement if we include the Naskapis of Schefferville who are on the verge, as you know, of concluding an agreement.

Testimony before the standing committee of the other house has shown that other non-signatories living outside the territory, for example, the Inuit of Labrador, have only peripheral interest in it. In fact, it could probably be said that any interest of non-signatories in the lands concerned would not cover more than 10 per cent of the territory. Keeping this in mind, I would like to repeat certain comments which I made earlier in this debate.

In signing the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement the federal government recognizes that certain other native groups might have some interest in the territory. Consequently, Canada insisted on the inclusion of paragraph 2.14 to protect their potential rights. In the opinion of the federal Department of Justice, expressed before the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, this undertaking by Quebec to negotiate with those natives, constitutes a legal obligation on the province. If Quebec fails to meet this obligation—which I do not believe will be the case—I would like to remind honourable senators that the Minister of Indian Affairs has said that Canada will assume its responsibility to protect any natives who can establish a valid claim in the territory.

[Translation]

Finally, I should like to answer some of the comments made by Senator Asselin on clause 5 of the bill. The procedure provided for by that clause gives Parliament a say in any amendment to that agreement, or any other future agreement concerning northern Quebec. To my mind, neither this house nor the other has a role to play in the negotiation of the settlement of our native peoples' claims. The Indians and the Inuit are the ones who can best accomplish that task. If they can achieve a settlement that suits them, then it will be normal to ask the two houses to express their views, but far be it from me to believe that we should take part in the negotiation of those agreements. Still, nothing will prevent the Senate nor the House of Commons from expressing their suggestions, in the case of a negative result, suggestions which could be taken into consideration by the parties concerned.

During deliberations in the Senate last week, I believe it was Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) who put a question to Senator Asselin and to which I myself replied. He asked then what amount of money the federal government would spend under those circumstances. I mentioned two figures, one of $32.75 million and the other, $75 million. In fact, the amount the federal government would pay, under the circumstances, would be $32.75 million.

Honourable senators, those are the remarks I wanted to make at this time but, before closing, I should like to stress the importance of this bill to our native peoples in northern Quebec, and I trust the Senate will give it its approval.

I am sure also that, as Senator Asselin and I mentioned on second reading, there are many points of law to be discussed in connection with this bill. That is why it seems to me honourable senators would benefit from its deferral to committee where they can be given more details in this regard.

● (2020)

[English]

Senator Williams: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Bourget one or two questions with respect to the language bill. He has mentioned the fact that a number of Crees are involved in the James Bay Agreement. As I understand the bill, it states that only those parents who speak English will have the right to seek English for their offspring, and only those children who have attended English schools in the past will have the right to pursue English as a second language. The fact is that the Iroquois or any other natives, apart from the Crees, who are residents of that area definitely have English as their second language. In my view, only their offspring will have the right to pursue or learn English as a second language. I do not think that is right.

Senator Bourget also stated, if I understood him correctly, that the services of the federal government, through its Department of Indian Affairs, will remain the same as in the past. I cannot see how that can be, when the agreement takes away some of the basic rights of the native people in the area involved, and pays them a certain number of millions of dollars. The Indian people, in turn, cannot effectively be governed by the Indian Act. Clearly in the James Bay agreement they will become municipalities, and municipalities that will be responsible to the Government of Quebec.

Senator Bourget: Honourable senators, with regard to the first question concerning language rights, this was put to the Minister of Northern Affairs in connection with Bill 1 of the Quebec government, and he said that he had referred it to the Minister of Justice for a legal opinion. Therefore, I cannot at this time provide a complete answer to my honourable friend's question, but no doubt he will have the opportunity to attend the meetings of the committee where he can put his question to the minister.

With regard to the honourable senator's second question concerning the rights of the native people, from my understanding of the bill and the convention they will retain the same rights that they have had in the past. Perhaps my honourable friend will be able to obtain more information in committee. I repeat that from my understanding of the bill the native people will retain the same rights as they have had in the past.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Bourget moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 18, the debate on the motion of Senator Austin for second reading of Bill C-309, respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I shall make two observations about this bill. The first is legal and technical and the second will be of a more general nature. As for the first, which I have described as legal and technical, when the bill was introduced in the House of Commons it established a corporation to be known as:

the Institute of Solar Energy Application (hereinafter referred to as the "Institute").

● (2030)

Clause 2 then went on to say:

(2) The Institute shall consist of ten members appointed by the Governor in Council from among Canadian citizens who shall serve without remuneration.

The third clause of the bill determined what the institute could do; namely, undertake research; encourage the establishment of an industry producing solar energy equipment and parts; subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, receive assistance from government departments and agencies, and acquire money, securities, or other property by gift, bequest or otherwise.

The fourth and final clause said:

4. Nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to require an appropriation of public revenue or an expenditure out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

That was the way the bill was introduced in the House of Commons. When it emerged from that house certain changes had taken place. The institute was created, but a different clause 3 was added which said:

3. (1) The affairs of the Institute shall be managed by a board of directors composed of not fewer than ten and not more than twenty-five members of the Institute who are Canadian citizens and who shall serve without remuneration.

The rest of the bill is substantially the same, except that it says:

3. (2) Directors shall be elected by the members of the Institute.

In the bill as it came out of the House of Commons nowhere does it say how the membership of the institute shall be comprised. It says that the members shall elect the directors, but it does not determine who shall be the members of the institute. In other words, the Governor in Council, who previously created the members, has now withdrawn and is not even to create the members of the institute. Only the Lord knows, I presume, who shall be the members who shall elect the directors of the institute.

This is a serious defect and ought to be corrected in a committee of the Senate if the bill is to have any effect whatever. That is my first observation, which I described as legal and technical. It seems to me that the bill as it now stands is completely a "nothing" bill.

Secondly, I want to say that I doubt very much the necessity or usefulness of an enactment like this, in any event. I have been distressed in other connections by the whittling away of the authority, power and responsibility of the National Research Council in Canada. Indeed, if things go as they are expected to, I suppose that we shall have before us, before too many weeks, legislation which will split the National Research Council and divide its responsibilities among two other councils; but the NRC in Canada has had an excellent record in research in many, many endeavours, including research into the application, use and development of solar energy. I question whether we are going to add anything to the research resources of Canada by creating another corporation such as is envisaged by this bill. I do not want to ask for a vote to shoot this bill down on second reading but it seems to me that when the bill was introduced in the House of Commons it was barely viable, and that the way it emerged from the House of Commons makes it not viable at all. It seems to me that it is quite unnecessary, and so I hope that if the bill is referred to a committee of the Senate some of these points will be inquired into.

I do not think this is an important matter. I doubt if this corporation can accomplish anything, in any event, but if it is in fact created, and should it have the effect of whittling away the powers, authorities, accomplishments and responsibilities of the National Research Council, then I think we are doing a disservice to the nation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL UNITY

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 19, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault, calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I am pleased on this my first occasion to address you to have the opportunity of speaking to the inquiry of the Leader of the Government calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

[Translation]

In the most distinguished of assemblies, tradition reassures the old-timers and intimidates the newcomer. One of the most fraternal of traditions is that of the French Academy. Under Cardinal, the Grey Eminence, the newcomer takes his inspiration directly from the old-timer who is his predecessor. It is by praising the former occupant of his chair that the future academician earns the right to take his succession.

Here, in the Red Chamber, the chair is not transferred from man to man and not even, Madam Speaker, from man to woman.

However, another tradition of the "Immortels" seems worthy of our interest. It was the custom of Richelieu, which is at the very origin of the academy, deliberately to transform the secret to the public for the benefit of the nation. This great 17th century statesman transformed a sacred cénacle of eight poets into a prestigious assembly of 40 cultured minds. Our house is not a secret coterie, but it is largely unknown to the Canadian public and deserves to have its potential and its relevancy known.

Honourable senators, I would like to plead for a progressive change in our traditions: from a little-known and often-ignored "council", we can become a dynamic and more manifestly democratic public institution.

[English]

Honourable senators, I say democratic because I shall try to show, first, that our constitutional mission fits the demands of today's crisis; and, second, that our individual and collective experience in the political party system gives us an important opportunity, and that is to encourage Canadians to participate in politics. And by politics, I mean party politics.

The heart of the present crisis, in my opinion, is a confrontation of political power. In our country such power confrontations are settled at the ballot box, the culmination of party activity. When all the conferences and study groups have resolved and dissolved, the decision will still be the consensus in the polling booths. Many organizations can, will and should seek consensus, but the only organizations whose very nature forces them towards a national consensus are the national political parties.

Honourable senators, the question before us is that of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada. For me that poses three questions: First, what are the elements of the present crisis? Second, how does the Senate's constitutional mission match the demands of that crisis? Third, what can the capacity of the Senate and of the party system do to "meet more effectively" that crisis?

The first question, then, is: What is the nature of the crisis? It is presumptuous of me, of course, to think that I can fully describe or diagnose it. But as a Canadian, and now as a senator, I think it cowardly not to try. In the 1960s I was a member of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. One of the greatest experiences of my life was my association with its members, and particularly with its co-chairman, André Laurendeau.

In February of 1965, in a preliminary report, that commission reported to the nation its need to share with fellow citizens the experience they had been through and the lessons taken so far. They stated that experience very simply by saying that they had been:

—driven to the conclusion that Canada, without being fully conscious of the fact, is passing through the greatest crisis in its history.

The source of the crisis lies in the Province of Quebec; that fact could be established without an extensive inquiry. There are other secondary sources in the French-speaking minorities of the other provinces and in the "ethnic minorities"—although this does not mean in any way that to us such problems are in themselves secondary. But, although a provincial crisis at the outset, it has become a Canadian crisis, because of the size and strategic importance of Quebec, and because it has inevitably set off a series of chain reactions elsewhere.

What does the crisis spring from? Our inquiry is not far enough advanced to enable us to establish exactly its underlying causes and its extent.

All we can do is describe it as we see it now: it would appear from what is happening that the state of affairs established in 1867, and never since seriously challenged, is now for the first time being rejected by the French Canadians of Quebec.

Who is right and who is wrong? We do not even ask ourselves that question; we simply record the existence of a crisis which we believe to be very serious.

Remember, this is in 1965:

If it should persist and gather momentum it could destroy Canada. On the other hand, if it is overcome, it will have contributed to the rebirth of a richer and more dynamic Canada. But this will be possible only if we face the reality of the crisis and grapple with it in time.

Honourable senators, if, as I believe, that analysis still fundamentally holds true, and if I have correctly interpreted the many expressions of analysis and feelings on this subject in recent years, it is fair to say that the nature of the present crisis essentially concerns provincial rights and minority rights—what Mr. Laurendeau called the two aspects of the Canadian equation.

With respect to minority rights there is institutional bilingualism, where the minority meets the majority in shared institutions, and, secondly, provincial rights—Quebec's place in Confederation—and, thirdly, if I may update Mr. Laurendeau, something we have found in recent years, regional alienation, east, west and north.

With reference to the question of minority rights and bilingualism at the interface—equal rights in shared institutions—I think we can say with some safety that the news is good news. The reforms set in place are on the rails. The storms have been weathered. The Official Languages Act has been passed, supported by all parties. There have been seven years of administration by the Commissioner of Official Languages, and, according to his figures, 80 per cent is good and 20 per cent bad, and that 20 per cent curable. The bad news with reference to minority rights is perhaps outside the federal sphere. Certainly, in Ontario, in New Brunswick and in Manitoba progress has been, I think, unacceptably slow. I refer you, honourable senators, for the details of this unacceptably slow progress to a recent report by La Fédération des francophones hors du Québec, "Les héritiers de Lord Durham."

The second part of the equation is provincial rights; Quebec's place in Confederation. Here, too, as we have discussed in dealing with the inquiry of the Leader of the Government, we realize that the news is not good. I am not here to draw up any bill of indictment, but the feeling or place of Quebec in Confederation, certainly so far as Quebec is concerned, is not, as we speak tonight, felt to be secure. As far as regional alienation outside of Quebec is concerned, we have all had on our desks this week eloquent expressions of the price we pay for our continental geography. I am referring to the reports of Mr. Justice Berger and Mr. Justice Hall.

Having found, or having sought to persuade you, honourable senators, that the basic nature of the present crisis deals with minority rights and provincial rights, how does the constitutional mission of the Senate match the demands of that crisis? Honourable senators, as one of the newest of the new boys in this chamber I ask your indulgence to what you might think the presumption to pedantry or an attempt to lecture fellow Canadians who, as senators, have vaster experience and knowledge, both as Canadians and as senators, than have I. I assure you I have no intention to preach, only to share with you my feelings that Canada's present crisis calls us all forth, and that Canadians have a right to expect service beyond the call of duty from all of their institutions, and that the Senate can be in the vanguard of any reforms necessary to safeguard and protect the essentials of our precious constitutional heritage.

As a new boy, honourable senators, I received the material from Senate officials dealing with the history of the Senate, the speeches and statements of the Fathers of Confederation, and the reasons for establishing the Senate. I know I would be preaching to my superiors and my elders on the subject, and I will spare you quotations. I will spare you the zeal of the convert, as in the case, you may remember, of Claire Booth Luce when she had been converted to Catholicism and arranged, through her influential husband, Henry Luce, an audience with the Pope. When she went to see the Pope she exulted about the wonders of being a Catholic, how all the doctrine hung together so well, how it was such an inspiration in her life, and how it was the greatest thing that had ever happened to her, her conversion to Catholicism. His Holiness finally stopped her and said, "Thank you, madam, but I am already a Catholic."

So, honourable senators, I won't bore you with quotations from the Fathers of Confederation, because I know you have read the material and know it better than I. However, if I have read those books correctly, then they all agree that a study of the speeches and documents leading to Confederation illuminated three main themes or principles as foundations for the establishment of the Senate as one of the pillars of Confederation. The three themes are: property rights and the protection of property rights, minority rights, and provincial rights. I will not say anything about property rights, except perhaps you will permit me a very brief neo-Marxist digression. Few of us, if any, here are Marxists, but most, I think, are familiar with his teachings. I only in passing draw your attention to the report in the Toronto Star that an astonishingly large percentage of separatist supporters are not property holders, and that an equally astonishingly high percentage of federalist supporters are property holders. I leave it to those who are more skillful in the theories of Marx to try to make something out of the intriguing possibilities that flow from that aspect of our crisis. I am more concerned with the other two—that is, minority rights and provincial rights.

Clearly the Fathers of Confederation created the Senate for just the kind of crisis we now have if, as it seems, the present crisis does concern primarily minority rights and provincial rights, and the pressures of these minority rights and provincial rights are putting heavy strain on the organism. For that reason, I heartily support the government leader's initiative in drawing the Senate's attention to it.

But what can we do? I look forward to your individual interventions, honourable senators, in answer to that question. For my part, let me turn to my third theme, the party system.

I begin by confessing that I am a lifelong, unashamed and unapologetic partisan of the party system and, as a corollary, a supporter of one of our national parties. Since studying political science in university I have seen the party system as the lubricant that makes all the formal mechanisms of the Constitution work. I know that I have many colleagues here who share that belief. Many of us engaged fully in party politics before we were summoned here. Some of us were summoned here partly, at least, because of that activity; I know I was, and I see nothing unnatural or shameful in that fact. Everyone I know wants to be a statesman, but it seems that no one wants to be a politician.

I was reading Alain's marvellous little book Propos sur le bonheur recently, and in one chapter entitled Discours aux ambitieux he has a comment that I think is relevant:

[Translation]

If you are not prepared to tell some home truths to a man who could open doors for you, do not say that you really wanted to get ahead; you were dreaming that you were, just as one sometimes dreams that one is a bird. It is as if you were dreaming of being a minister and not having to see people or manage anything.

[English]

I cannot understand why voluntary partisan political activity is often held in disrepute, and why it should be surprising when politicians are appointed to a political institution. We appoint scientists to scientific institutions; we appoint musicians to musical institutions; we appoint lawyers to legal institutions. In fact, our appointment here is not unlike the appointment of lawyer to the bench. A good judge gets his perspective and judgement partly, but importantly, from his previous experience as a partisan lawyer. We, as experienced politicians, can use that experience and our privileged, non-elected and, therefore, independent perspective to, among other things, meet the present challenge of unfulfilled minority and provincial expectations by encouraging Canadians to participate in one of our most important political institutions, the party system.

Honourable senators, let me cite a great Canadian in support of the key role of the political parties:

It is one thing for individuals to pursue their own interests, as they always have; it becomes a qualitatively different kind of society when individuals organize to pursue their individual interests collectively. National life has become a struggle for advantage among large and powerful organizations, not simply corporations and trade unions. Organized pressure groups abound.

The only organizations whose nature forces them to work toward a national consensus are the national political parties. Whatever their faults, weaknesses and shortcomings, whatever their stumbling, political parties must try to put together, and keep together by adjustment, a consensus which is acceptable to enough Canadians to get elected.

But the national political parties do not command the loyalties of as high a proportion of Canadians as used to be the case. Most Canadians prefer to give their loyalty and their support to an organization designed to service their particular personal interests... we should develop our forces of cohesion and in particular recognize the cohesive role that national political parties can play... but in fact national political parties are the only mass organizations we have which are forced to try to see the country as a whole and to reconcile regional and other differences.

Honourable senators, that is a quotation from an address by the Honourable Robert Stanfield in the fifth lecture in the George C. Nowlan lectureship series at Acadia University in Wolfville last month.

Are Mr. Stanfield and I overstating the consensus role of the parties in the present crisis of minority rights and provincial rights? The textbook, or classic roles of the political parties (poli-sci 100 at perhaps any university) are three: First, an effective role for men and women to do useful things together for their country, a way in which the individual can count and weigh on the collectivity; second, to clarify issues and thereby make decisions or, as economists say, illuminating alternatives; and third, to make elections possible by helping the choice by the elector among a multitude of candidates.

Have the political parties played these roles in history with reference particularly to our interest tonight, which is minority rights and provincial rights? I believe they have. Here are a few examples with reference to minority rights.

We have already referred to slow progress in minority rights outside Quebec, but would there have been any progress in minority rights in Ontario if the Conservative Party had not finally taken up minority rights in Ontario as a party issue? Would there have been any progress in New Brunswick if the party of our colleague, the Honourable Senator Robichaud, had not determined to make it a party issue to pass the New Brunswick Official Languages Act? In Canada itself, would there have been any Official Languages Act but for the support of all the political parties? As another example of minority rights protection by the parties, if the traditional parties had not failed to make plain the option between survival and assimilation, would a Parti Acadien have been necessary at all? Would Robert Stanfield's disavowal of Leonard Jones have been necessary except for his perception of the divergence between the candidate's view on minority rights and his party's views on that issue?

As for provincial rights, it was not until a rather skillful political party of team-minded footballers took power in Alberta that those of us in the east had to worry about freezing in the dark, whether or not our parents had the benefit of holy wedlock. In history, Joseph Howe at Confederation and Joseph Smallwood in 1949 identified party with provincial aspiration rights in which the fate of the province itself was at stake.

What of separatism itself? Where would separatism be without a political party?

[Translation]

Before the separatist option was taken over by a coherent and disciplined party it was a dream, indeed an illusion entertained by small groups of pseudo-intellectuals and revolutionaries.

All told, honourable senators, I see in this brief analysis the revelation of a fortunate coincidence for this house: the traditional roles of the Senate, the elements of the present crisis, the classic usefulness of the parties—those three things put together set for us an important mission of popular education.

Too many Canadians mistrust parties. That, admittedly is due to the human failures that we, for the most part experienced party workers, know better than many others. But those weaknesses must not make us lose sight of the indispensable nature of political formations to clarify the alternatives and ensure the very effectiveness of political activity.

Honourable senators, let us make that reality known to Canadians. Let us make it known to them without any embarrassment nor excuse as the principal condition of a society which wants to govern itself in freedom and stability.

Regional conferences, popular publications, information tours of all kinds, that is the leadership that is demanded of the Senate by the combination of our traditions and the present crisis—an active, not passive role. No inquiry but education to put to use our experience and privileges to answer the question that thousands of Canadians are asking today: "What can I do?"

On motion of Senator Rizzuto, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 25, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the number and amount of loans to Indians made under section 70(1) of the Indian Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1977, pursuant to section 70(6) of the said Act, Chapter I-6, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Orders of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, respecting compensation plans between The Health Sciences Centre, Winnipeg, Manitoba and certain employees, represented by the International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 827. Orders dated May 20, 1977.

Copies of a Summary of Ocean Dumping Permits issued under the authority of the Ocean Dumping Control Act in the calendar years 1975 and 1976, pursuant to section 28(3) of the said Act, Chapter 55, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HELSINKI AGREEMENT—CUSTOMS DUTY ON GIFTS TO U.S.S.R.—
QUESTION

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question.

Since the signing of the Helsinki Agreement, has the customs duty levied by the Soviet Union on gifts sent by citizens of Canada to relatives in the Soviet Union increased or decreased? If so, by what percentage?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice because of its detailed nature.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: I should like to advise honourable senators that it is expected the Senate will sit on Monday evening. I hope that this notice will enable honourable senators to make the appropriate travel plans.

Senator Flynn: Is there any special reason?

Senator Perrault: It is because of the great volume of work being advanced by the government on behalf of the country.

Senator Flynn: Have you nothing other than that platitude to offer?

The Senate resumed from yesterday, the debate on the motion of Senator Austin for the second reading of Bill C-309, respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators—

Senator Perrault: Let there be light.

Senator Grosart: Let there be energy.

Bill C-309, which was introduced by Senator Austin last week, is entitled "An Act respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy." It is a unique bill; certainly one of the most unusual that has ever come to us in my time here. In the first place, the bill was originally a private member's bill, and still is a private member's bill originating in the other place. As we all know, it is very seldom that a private member's bill gets through the mill of the Commons and reaches us. I have, of course, no criticism to make of the fact that a private member's bill has come to us. As a matter of fact, in my view it would be a good thing if far more such bills got through that mill.

However, I would not include this bill in that generalization. This is probably the worst kind of bill that should be presented to the Senate after passage in the House of Commons. I say that because Parliament, by this bill, is asked to establish an institute to be known as the Institute for Solar Energy Application.

I think I will pause for a moment until Senator Argue and the leader have concluded their business. My voice is not as strong as that of Senator Argue, and I have difficulty sometimes hearing myself over him.

Senator Croll: That is a good example of energy.

Senator Grosart: I will not match mine with Senator Argue—not at my age.

Senator Argue: You are doing very well.

Senator Grosart: This bill asks Parliament to establish an institute in the private sector. Why this should require an act of Parliament is beyond me. We have reached the stage at which even a bank can be incorporated by ordinary legislation, and if we were to pick an institute that requires whatever prestige may flow from incorporation by Parliament, it would certainly not be this one.

This measure deals with solar energy, and I believe all honourable senators would agree that the subject matter is good. It is very important to Canada that we proceed as quickly and as efficiently as possible with an examination of the possibility of utilizing solar energy as one of the renewable energy sources available to us. This, however, will not be the major source in the renewable field, even if nuclear energy, which in some of its aspects is a renewable source, is excluded. The best prospect of its contributing to our energy needs is that it might in 15 years provide about one per cent.

My argument, however, is not on that point. If Parliament is asked to incorporate an institute in the solar energy field, surely we can then expect similar bills to incorporate institutes in all the other areas of renewable energy, such as bio-mass—which is the use of agricultural and forest waste—wind energy, geothermal energy, hydraulic energy, tidal energy, and so on. So the first question that arises is: Are bills to be introduced requesting Parliament to incorporate institutes for each of these sources of energy? In my opinion, the question indicates the absurdity of the suggestion and, therefore, the absurdity of the bill now before us.

The fact of the matter is that this institute could be incorporated as a viable entity by going down to the city hall with $5 and making out the necessary papers. The more usual manner in which to proceed, of course, would be through the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and an application for a regular charter. So I ask: Why is this bill necessary? Perhaps the answer will be that this is a private member's bill. This private member is very popular and hard-working, and perhaps this was a consolation prize to him for some other disappointments he may have had. We cannot object to that very much, except that we face a continual problem of criticism from the public, and from the public service itself, that the legislative process is so slow and the legislative calendar so cluttered up with important bills that it is necessary from time to time to take such shortcuts as $1 items in the supplementary estimates—that is, amending bills by $1 items—and so on. When we inquire as to the reason, we are invariably told that it takes too long for a bill to pass through Parliament. Well, somehow time has been found to pass this bill, and present it to us.

Then there is the question: What purpose will this bill serve? The sponsor gave us a partial answer. He said this institute will be a bridge between the private sector research in this field and government research. I wonder if it will.

First of all, is there any necessity for another institute to do this? We already have a very substantial presence of both the private and public sectors in the field of solar energy. The government alone has expended about $10 million, and we have a complete establishment set up within government at this very time in this particular area. That establishment is spread among the NRC, which is involved in solar energy research, and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and its research program in respect of renewable resources, as well as programs within the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Fisheries and the Environment. In the private sector, believe it or not, there now exists the Solar Energy Society of Canada. It is in place. So, I ask why it is necessary to have another institute. It may be that it is necessary but, again, why should this sort of thing take up the time of Parliament?

Senator Hicks raised the very important question of the relationship of this institute to the NRC. He is, perhaps, a more staunch defender of NRC's areas of jurisdiction than I am. We are both members of the Science Policy Committee, and I certainly respect his views. I agree with his concern in this particular area. It does not appear in the bill as presented, but the sponsor went much further than to say this institute would be merely a bridge; he went so far as to say that this institute would take over all responsibility, both government and private sector, in this field. I wonder if that is so, but that was the statement he made. The bill was passed by the other place, so a case could be made that Parliament is giving this institute the right to take over all responsibility for solar research. Is that the intention?

The question also arises as to whether this is a government bill. It is not a government bill in the strict sense, but has it the support of the government? Is the government in favour of the establishment of this institute in this particular way? The answer, I think, is yes, because the sponsor was able to thank two ministers for their statements—once again, statements of the kind that we can expect from ministers in the other place—that they would agree to second reading of the bill and agree to have it referred to committee. That, in fact, took place, and the bill underwent some revision in committee.

The proposed objects of the institute are to carry out research, to receive assistance from government, and to acquire and expend moneys. Clause 5 makes it very clear that none of the expenses of the institute shall be a charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Obviously, the bill could not have been introduced as a private member's bill had it entailed a charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

So, what is this institute? It is not a government institute. There is some government sponsorship. We have claims as to its jurisdiction which seem to be contradictory. Again I ask: Why this bill? Is it a precedent? Is it a precedent that we will regret? Certainly, I think we would regret it if an honourable senator with a particular interest, let us say, in tidal energy were to rise in the Senate and request the first reading of a bill to set up an Institute for Tidal Energy Research in Canada.

Senator Hicks also raised an interesting question as to the draftsmanship of this bill. In fairness to Senator Austin, I believe he did agree that the draftsmanship was very deficient. If we pass the bill in its present form, which I hope we will not, it will put us in the absurd position of having incorporated, by act of Parliament, an institute with 12 to 25 directors but no members. As Senator Hicks pointed out yesterday, there is no provision whatever—not a word—in the bill to say who can or who should be members. Senator Austin did suggest that that is one matter that can be corrected when the bill is in committee. It will at least give us an opportunity in the Senate to put an amendment, not to a Commons bill but to one of our own, on the record, which will be another mark on the wall for Senate achievement. We are always very reluctant, I would almost say afraid, to amend Commons bills, but at least we will probably have the courage in this case to amend one of our own.

The long term prospects of solar energy are actually raised by this bill. I, for one, would say it is important that we carry on extensive research in this field. At the present time, there are something like 21 dwellings in Canada where experiments are going on. The prospects of any immediate relief of our energy problems from solar energy do not seem very great to me, especially when I consider that under present technology the receivers of solar energy—and this does not take into consideration the storage and distribution system—would take up half the floor space of a house and would cost from $10 to $20 a square foot. The outlook, as our own public service experts agree, is uncertain. As I said, the best prospect seems to be that about 1 per cent of our total energy requirements will come from solar energy in about 15 years.

The sponsor of this bill in the other place made some far-reaching recommendations such as tax credits to homeowners and industries who become involved, and perhaps this may be the next step.

Finally, I am interested in the particular statement made by Senator Austin that this institute would be funded to some extent from the private sector, but also from government departments and agencies, both federal and provincial. This introduces an odd element into the bill. The bill specifically prohibits anything covered by its terms requiring a charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund, but it also provides for the institute to obtain money from the government after it is formed.

Honourable senators, I hope that this bill will be referred to a committee, as suggested, and have a thorough examination there and amendment as necessary.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Austin expressed the hope that the debate would soon be terminated. I must say, however, that after listening to him, to Senator Hicks, and to Senator Grosart, I am convinced we should kill this bill right now at the second reading stage. This bill is very defective in form and in substance. It could not pass this place without amendments which would change its nature entirely. I would ask, therefore, that before the debate is concluded the Leader of the Government tell us exactly what the government's position is with regard to this bill. Does the government endorse the creation of this institute? If it does, how does it relate the work of the institute with that of the National Research Council? Will the government fund this institute? What exactly will the position of this bill be? If the government leader tells me that the amendments the government proposes to make in committee will render this bill viable and logical, that is one thing. But, in order to make this institute a workable proposition it would be necessary to change the entire nature of the bill. Any amendments made in committee to do that would have the effect of making this an entirely new bill, and the bill would certainly, for that reason, be irregular.

At this stage, second reading, I cannot vote for this bill; nor do I think the Senate should vote for it. In my opinion the bill is—well, there is a word which describes this kind of legislation perfectly, but it is hardly parliamentary. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate in order to give the Leader of the Government a chance to find some answers or explanations as to the position of the government with respect to the bill.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

EXCISE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING—DEBATE

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey moved the second reading of Bill C-54, to amend the Excise Tax Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, before proceeding to discuss Bill C-54, I should just like to take the opportunity to compliment Senator Frith on the excellent maiden speech he delivered last night. I have known Senator Frith for some 20 years, and during that time I have worked closely with him. I have always had the highest admiration for his great ability, which he demonstrated so well last evening.

Bill C-54 seeks to implement the proposals contained in the Ways and Means Motions of March 31 and April 18, 1977, relating to federal sales and excise taxes and the air transportation tax.

With regard to the sales tax measures, Bill C-54 provides for the extension of the period within which a person may apply to recover tax by way of refund, deduction or other payment in the general refund provisions of the Excise Tax Act. Currently, the act provides for a two-year time limit. This contrasts with the usual limitation period, at least in the common law provinces, of six years with respect to the recovery of moneys due. Most people who are barred by the present two-year limitation period are either individuals or companies who, through ignorance or carelessness, simply overlook the fact that they must apply within the two-year period in order to get a refund of moneys paid by them for sales and excise taxes which they did not actually owe. The Income Tax Act permits the department to reopen an assessment up to four years after the assessment has been made and, of course, at any time when fraud is involved. It would appear only reasonable that, if the department has four years in which to ask for further income taxes, the taxpayer should then have four years in which to ask for refunds of sales and excise taxes, which he is often required to pay even if they are not actually owed. This extension will apply to all applications, other than those which have expired on or before March 31, 1977. This limitation appears to me not to be equitable.

If the two-year period expired on March 31, then the taxpayer cannot apply for a refund. If it expired on April 1, 1977, he has an additional two years to ask for a refund. Why should not the requirement simply be changed so that anyone can make an application for a refund after March 31, provided it is within the four-year time limit at the time of the application? I would suggest that this is a requirement that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee might well enquire about, and give special consideration to, when they are considering this bill.

By clause 7 of the bill, which amends section 27 of the act, it is proposed to change the current 12 per cent ad-valorem sales tax levy on gasoline and diesel fuel to a specific levy per gallon which varies from 4.618 cents per gallon for diesel fuel to a high of 5.507 cents per gallon for grade one gasoline. The specific levies imposed by this amendment are identical to the levies imposed by Revenue Canada as a result of the new authorized values for tax which became effective March 2, 1977.

The Excise Tax Act currently imposes sales tax as a percentage of the sale price without reference to the trade level at which goods are sold. Refiners of petroleum products regularly sell products to each other at nominal values representing little more than bare manufacturing costs to utilize production capacity and minimize distribution costs.

Under the law as it is presently written, these inter-company sales could constitute the tax point for the exchanged product, and all of the subsequent marketing and distribution value added would escape the tax. Thus, for the refiners' own product sold directly to retailers, the tax would be on the price charged to the retailer while for the jobbed product a much lower value for tax would apply.

To eliminate this anomaly, Revenue Canada has made an agreement with most of the oil companies to accept tax on an average price, although this average tended to be favourable to the industry to obtain their agreement. Simply stated, these values are weighted averages of the volumes of the product sold to four classes of customers which are: First, service stations which sell the company's name brands and which may be company-operated or independently operated; secondly, independent resellers who sell private brands; thirdly, large commercial or industrial users such as transportation companies; and fourthly, other refiners. As prices increase—for example, when the price of oil is adjusted—Revenue Canada conducts a survey and, based on their findings, amends the industry values.

A further complexity arises from the fact that markets must be found for excess production. In times of excess supply, the oil companies regularly dispose of excess products to private brand operators at depressed prices which are lower than those charged to their own franchised outlets. Before the average price arrangement referred to above was introduced, the complaint was made that the private brander had an advantage over the franchised retailer because he enjoyed a better price, and a further advantage because that preferred price attracted a smaller amount of tax per gallon. Thus, one of the pluses credited to the average price arrangement was that it caused a gallon of product to bear a specific amount of tax irrespective of the value at which it was sold to retailers.

However, at the time the average price arrangement was introduced, there was a reluctance to formally amend the law to provide for a specific tax, on the premise that a specific levy would not be automatically responsive to inflation.

The present system has certain flaws which are:

(1) in practice it is a pseudo-specific tax albeit based loosely upon a weighted historical average of sale prices at several different trade levels;

(2) its periodic revisions are viewed by the public as tax increases rather than adjustments to reflect price increases notwithstanding the government's previous reluctance to formalize it that way in the law;

(3) it has no basis in law and continues to operate only with the acquiescence of the industry; and

(4) one oil company has voiced its mounting objection to the arrangement and there is concern on the part of Revenue Canada that the current agreement with the industry may break down at any time. If this did happen, and the industry commenced accounting for tax on inter-refinery transfer values, a revenue loss of $40 million to $50 million would occur.

The main advantage to the taxpayer in the proposed amendment is that the tax on gasoline and diesel fuel will not be increased upwards proportionately every time there is an increase in the price of these fuels. This tax is, in effect, frozen at the proposed level per gallon, and will not be increased by government arrangements with the oil industry every six months or so when fuel prices are increased. The only way this specific tax per gallon will be increased is through the budgetary process with the approval of Parliament.

By clause 8 of the bill, which amends section 29 of the act, sales tax relief is provided for the retail industry and, in particular, small retailers who, as a result of metric conversion, have to purchase new metric scales. The effect of the amendment is that the rate of tax on these scales is 6 per cent. The 100 kilogram limit was selected as it was felt that this was sufficiently high for most scales normally used in retail operations to qualify for the relief. The relief is extended only to the retailers because, for them, the long-term benefits of metric conversion are not expected to exceed the short-term costs. The relief will apply until July 1, 1981. It is expected that by the end of this period, conversion to the metric system of measure will be complete.

By clauses 9 and 10 of the bill, which amend subsections 31(2) and 40(2) of the act, the requirement is removed that in order to qualify for the small manufacturer provision a person must sell his goods exclusively by retail—that is, to the ultimate users.

This amendment is complementary to the announcement by the Minister of National Revenue that the regulation prescribing "small manufacturers" under the Excise Tax Act will be amended to increase the annual sales value to $10,000 from the present $3,000. Persons who manufacture goods, for sale or for their own use, valued at $10,000 or less annually, will no longer have to be licensed, or have to account for sales and excise tax. Furthermore, the Minister of National Revenue has also announced that certain Canadian craftsmen will be classified as "small manufacturers" with no restrictions as to sales volume, and thus the products of these Canadian craftsmen will also be exempt from sales tax.

"Small manufacturers" as a class are exempt from paying sales and excise tax on the sale price of their finished products; however, tax remains applicable to raw materials, components and equipment used in their manufacturing operations, so that it is only the value added by the "small manufacturers" which escapes sales and excise taxes. The Minister of National Revenue emphasized that the regulations will be amended as soon as the broader statutory authority proposed in the budget regulations is enacted.

The basic rationale of the "small manufacturers" provision is administrative feasibility, as the revenue generated by these firms would not cover the costs incurred in ensuring compliance. To ensure that they pay at least a part of their fair share of the tax burden they are required to pay tax on their inputs. Paying on inputs also mitigates to some extent the disparity in tax burden between those firms who are relieved of the obligation to pay tax on their sales and small manufacturers and others who are denied that privilege because their sales volume exceeds the limit.

With regard to other sales tax measures in Bill C-54, these changes are designed to extend sales tax relief to certain users of products such as additional aids to the handicapped, or to eliminate loopholes and anomalies in existing statutory provisions. All of them are relatively minor in nature.

Bill C-54 also provides for the extension of the Canadian air transportation tax to apply to tickets purchased outside of Canada for air transportation involving a departure from a Canadian airport for a destination outside of Canada. Honourable senators will recall that the government announced its intention to extend this tax in the budget of May 25, 1976. This measure, to become effective November 1, 1977, provides that the approximately 2.3 million air travellers who purchase their tickets outside of Canada will be taxed in a manner which closely parallels the system in effect for Canadians, and thus will ensure that foreign travellers who use Canadian airports will contribute their fair share to the costs of Canadian airport facilities.

Honourable senators, that concludes my remarks on Bill C-54, although I shall be happy to answer any questions to the best of my ability. It is hardly necessary for me to add that this bill, if it receives second reading, should be referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 18, the debate on the motion of Senator Barrow for the second reading of Bill S-4, to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is not by my choice that I am speaking to you a second time today on a bill. That is just the way the wheel turns.

The bill before us originates in the Senate. It is entitled "An Act to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada".

This, again, to some extent, is a unique bill. It may well be breaking new ground in the whole area of government intervention in the private sector. It is somewhat unique in that it is a bill originating in the Senate, and for that reason, it would seem to me to require thorough scrutiny by the Senate of both its purpose and the implications of its stated purposes.

As Senator Barrow said in his introduction, it concerns a matter of the utmost importance to Canadians. That, of course, is the conservation of energy and the search for further energy sources in Canada. However, it is my opinion that the Senate requires a great deal more information about this bill than it has so far. Normally, with respect to a bill of this kind, we would have had an explanation by the minister, and the bill would have gone to committee in the other place and been thoroughly scrutinized. In view of the far-reaching implications of this bill, it is important that we have a good deal more information than has been provided to us. In making that statement I am not criticizing Senator Barrow because I think it is fair to say that he has provided us with the information that was available to him, and, perhaps it is also fair to say, the information which the minister and his officials thought would be enough, or at least necessary, for the Senate. I do not suggest there is an attempt to sneak this bill through, but I do suggest that it deserves very careful scrutiny by the Senate, and that we require much more information than we have at the present time.

I have said that this bill may be breaking new ground. Its purpose is to require a list of existing companies in the oil exploration business to make certain facts and figures available to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which are not required by statute of other corporations—any other corporations, as far as I know—except under the Income Tax Act. In effect, this bill would provide very extensive powers to the minister—powers that are not now available to Revenue Canada—in cases of suspected evasions. As far as the government is concerned, the purpose is clearly stated as follows:

2. The purpose of this Act is to provide legislative authority for the collection of certain statistics relating to Canada's petroleum industry in order to

(a) enable the Government of Canada to better plan and develop policies for the management of Canada's energy supplies and resources; and

(b) provide the Government of Canada with the detailed knowledge necessary to give authoritative assurances to the Canadian people that those policies are being effectively pursued in Canada.

I am certain no one will object to the government's saying that we need all the information we can get about what is going on in this critical field, but is this the right way to go about getting this information? Another question that arises is: Does the government not have this information it is seeking? We now have an energy policy. Is the government saying, "We have given you an energy policy, after long deliberations, but we now need more information"? Perhaps so, but it seems a little late, after the government has announced its policy, to say, "We now need further information."

The method by which this information is to be obtained is described in clause 5:

(1) Every corporation shall, for each prescribed reporting period beginning after December 31, 1975, file with the Minister within the prescribed time a return relating to all sources and applications of funds and to the exploration, production, refining and marketing of petroleum and petroleum products in respect of

(a) in the case of a corporation listed in Schedule I, that corporation and every body corporate that it controls; or

(b) in the case of a corporation listed in Schedule II, the corporation's Canadian branch business.

So far we have not had an explanation of the distinction made in the two schedules, but no doubt that will come in due course. I think we should have it before we reach a decision on the principle of the bill.

These words immediately raise the question: Is this information not now available? In a moment I shall be speaking about the drastic measures the government intends to take to make sure they get the information, but surely we should be told why they do not have it, or why they think they cannot get it or will not get it. Clause 5 mentions "a return relating to all sources and applications of funds." I ask immediately: Are there any of these 35 companies that do not issue an annual statement? I cannot think of an annual statement issued by a company that does not relate to all sources and applications of funds. Secondly, the bill says "relating . . . to the exploration, production, refining and marketing of petroleum and petroleum products." One would assume that that information would also be there. Perhaps it is not, but I think we should be told why the information that is required is not now available from those companies. Are they different from other companies? Is there a special reason for them to be required to do this under the drastic conditions of this bill? Later on in the bill we find that the government takes to itself, or wishes to take to itself, powers to require additional information which is not covered by clause 5.

Another question arises here. What is meant by corporations engaged in "the exploration, production, refining or marketing of petroleum and petroleum products"? Would they include a company like Polysar? Is it dealing in petroleum products? It is not listed among those in the schedule. My information is that it has for a long time been dealing in the production of petroleum by-products.

I will come to the schedule in a moment, but this also raises the question why there appear to be no crown corporations in this list. As far as I can see, they are all in the private sector. Yet Petro-Canada is very much in this field. The last time I looked at its statement it had 45 per cent of the consortium in the Arctic islands, in which there are many private companies; it has 15 per cent in Syncrude Canada Ltd. and is involved of the Polar gas consortium; it purchased outright 100 per cent of what was once called Atlantic Richfield, now called the Petrocan Exploration Company. Is it a crown corporation? Why is it not in the list?

Does this mean that this crown corporation, if that is what it is, competing in this same field, consorting with companies in the same field, will be in the position, through the government, of having this information? It is only one of 200 companies competing in this area. Will it be the only one to have this information? Will the minister disclose it to the company? There are provisions dealing with ministerial disclosure that permit the minister to disclose any information that he thinks fit, and to anybody he thinks fit.

A moment ago I referred to Petro-Canada. I should have referred to Polysar. What I have said other than about the petroleum products, of course, refers wholly to Petrocan, which is in this field. It is Polysar which raises the question of whether it is in the petroleum products business. It, of course, has a strange history too, and there arises the question which has been asked but not answered by the government as to whether it is actually a crown corporation at the present time.

I have said that this bill, if passed, would authorize the government to take some drastic action to obtain the information it needs, or thinks it needs. I shall not read all the clauses, but I would give just a general indication. These clauses provide for obtaining the information required as to the sources and applications of funds and expenditures on production, refining, marketing, and so on. Under clause 8 the minister may require from any corporation, as defined in the bill:

(a) any information or additional information including a return of information . . . or

(b) production, or production on oath, of any books, letters, accounts, invoices, statements or other documents.

Under clause 9 a person authorized by the minister may enter "any premises or place where any business of a corporation is carried on", or where any property owned by the corporation subsists. An agent of the minister, if he suspects there has been a violation, may "seize and take away any of the documents, books, records, papers or things".

Specifically, certain subsections of the Income Tax Act apply here as though the wording in the Income Tax Act was, "the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources" rather than "the Minister of National Revenue". In other words, in this respect he is given all the powers of the Minister of National Revenue in the matter of taxation.

Under the enforcement clause, failure to comply with clause 8—which deals with the additional information required not the substance of the bill—renders a person liable on summary conviction to a fine of $5,000 for each day of default. An official found in violation of or non-compliance with the bill is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months. The same applies in another case where the statements given in the return are not regarded as correct, or are regarded as misleading. This provision in some of these bills is one that I do not understand. If the information is false, yes, I agree, but to make a person subject to six months in jail for making a statement in a return that is merely misleading seems to me to be utterly absurd. It does not speak of intent to mislead; it does not speak of motive; it is only if it is misleading, if it misleads the official, whether intentionally or not.

Clause 5 refers to schedule I and the corporations there listed, and every body corporate that those corporations control. I will not read the list because, honourable senators have it before them. There is a total of 34 corporations. These, and one other, are regarded as constituting about 90 per cent of the business, which, of course, is the rationale for limiting the list to this number. However, this does raise the question I mentioned earlier of these crown corporations. If I found myself able to say that I believe this bill is necessary, and that these drastic measures are necessary to enforce it, I would be inclined to say, "Let us apply this same principle to the crown corporations and agencies. Let us apply it to the CBC, to Air Canada, to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation." Let these same principles apply to these corporations, three of which I have mentioned, and others, who report, through their minister, that they will not answer questions asked by members of Parliament because it would not be in the public interest.

It is true that a bill is on the way—Bill C-20—that will go some of the way to correct this. At least, it will give the Auditor General the right to inquire into the books and statements of these companies, but it will still not begin to go as far as the extent of this bill with respect to private companies. Is it not important to the public that they should know, for example, how their money is spent by the CBC, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the CNR? This is not so with respect to all of them. As the Leader of the Government told me recently, six of these proprietary corporations' books at the moment are not available to the Auditor General, but they will be, I hope, when the new legislation is passed. Should not the same principle be applied? I am not sure that I would recommend such drastic measures as this, but I would like to see an act requiring all companies, crown agencies or otherwise, to make full public disclosure as required of their business.

Senator Barrow was good enough in private conversation to indicate to me that these companies have been consulted. I believe he said they asked for, or requested, this legislation. I do not doubt that, of course, for a minute, it unquestionably being the information he has. However, I would very much doubt that the companies came forward voluntarily and said, "Please subject us to this type of statutory government intervention in our business." No doubt the government told them it wants this information, and they replied that it must be made statutory as they do not wish to be in the position of being asked by their shareholders why such information was given when that was not a statutory requirement. However, I very much doubt if these companies in the private sector asked for this particular legislation, and this type of penalty and drastic enforcement.

There are two further points which I believe should be brought to the attention of honourable senators at this stage, because they go to the principle of the bill. I hope Senator Barrow will not say these can be dealt with in committee, because I hope that honourable senators will agree that some, if not all, of the matters I have raised go to the principle of the bill. We have to know what the purpose and effect of this bill will be, and I for one would not vote for it without having more information.

The statement was made by Senator Barrow that the main purpose of the bill really is to make sure that additional revenue which has accrued to these companies as a result of the increase in oil and gas prices will, indeed, be spent on exploration. I am quite sure that we would all agree that if there are additional revenues accruing to the companies, so-called windfall revenues, it is important that they be spent on finding new energy sources in their field. However, we are not told what such additional revenues are; we are not told if they have them, and I would want to know if the companies do have substantial additional revenues as a result of the price increase against which normal costs cannot be set off. So, what is the magnitude of these additional revenues? What percentage of the additional revenue will the government require these companies to spend on exploration? In my opinion, that is a very important question, and it goes to the very crux of the legislation.

Finally, Senator Barrow has been good enough to tell us that the department now has the questionnaire which will be sent to all these companies. This will be the statutory form which they will be required to complete and return. I would like to see it. This is one case in which we will not have to rely upon, or be put off by, the usual statement by a minister: "Well, of course, we cannot tell you what the regulations will be; we have not yet written them." That always appears to me to be nonsense, because I do not know how anyone can draft a bill without knowing what the regulations will be. In this case, however, we are told that this form under the legislation calling for the required information is ready, and the department has it. I hope that Senator Barrow will use his influence to procure it for us so that we can see exactly what information the government is demanding.

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Does the Honourable Senator Barrow intend only to answer questions?

Senator Barrow: I should like to attempt to answer some of Senator Grosart's questions, if I may. First of all, I wish to—

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Barrow speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Croll: He can answer the questions.

Senator Grosart: Before Senator Barrow speaks, I would plead with him, if he does not have the answers to all these questions, to take the time necessary to obtain them. He may be able to answer some of the questions now, but I find it difficult to believe he has the answers to all of them. I hope he will not close the debate.

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, obviously I do not have the answers to all the questions raised by Senator Grosart. I thought the bill was fairly uncomplicated, and I still do. However, he has raised a number of important questions which should be answered. If it is the wish of honourable senators, I will not close the debate but will attempt to obtain those answers for Senator Grosart tomorrow.

As I indicated to Senator Grosart privately, the government asked for this information from some 35 of these oil companies. At the time of requesting this information, or shortly thereafter, some 32 or 33 of the companies supplied the information immediately. It was necessary for the government to request a second time the additional information from three of the companies in question, and that information was forthcoming. However, it was at that time, I believe, that the suggestion was made that some legislative authority should be put forth so that all the companies would know that they were being dealt with on the same basis.

There is a completed questionnaire. It is confidential. It deals with the sources of revenue for each company. It deals with the application of that revenue. The second part of the questionnaire deals with the exploration, development, production, foreign expenditures by location and type for each company, and with the daily production of gas and oil in Canada.

It is necessary that this information be obtained so that the government can monitor it. It is not the kind of information that is available on a standard basis from the public reports of these various companies. The questionnaire was drawn up by government officials after consultation with representatives of the oil companies.

As to the reason why the crown corporation was not included in this, I cannot say. I will attempt to provide an answer on that tomorrow. In response to the question regarding the disclosure of information, perhaps I can read clause 6(4) of the bill, which states as follows:

The Minister may, where in his opinion it is in the public interest and will not unduly impair a corporation's competitive position, disclose any information obtained by him or an officer or employee of Her Majesty in the course of the administration or enforcement of this Act.

So that in fact the minister is not at liberty to disclose confidential information if, in his opinion, it will impair the competitive position of any of these various companies.

The requirements in connection with audit and examination are fairly standard, although insofar as the penalty of $5,000 per day is concerned, it may be said to be either too harsh or not harsh enough.

As to whether or not there will be any increase in the revenues to these companies due to the increase in prices, I think it is fair to say it is expected that there will be substantial increases in their revenues. For that reason the government wishes to ensure that any increased revenues are properly applied and not treated as windfall profits by the companies in question.

Those are the only responses I can make at this time to Senator Grosart's questions. I shall endeavour to make further responses tomorrow.

Senator Grosart: I thank the honourable senator for those very interesting answers. When he gives the information on the spread between cost and increased windfall revenues, would he also indicate, in a general way, the percentage of that windfall increase that is taken by other than the company, such as the provincial and federal governments, and so forth, so that we will have a balanced picture of the distribution of that windfall revenue among those who feel they are entitled to share in it.

Senator Barrow: I will attempt to do so.

On motion of Senator Barrow, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault, calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Honourable senators, this being my maiden speech in the house, first I would like to thank all those who contributed to my appointment to the Senate.

Madam Speaker, I want to assure you that I will always make it my duty to shoulder my responsibilities and I will do everything I can to continue to deserve the trust that has been put in me.

I also want to thank all honourable senators and staff members for the warm welcome I received.

Before I get on with my speech, may I be permitted, although I am newly arrived, to welcome the four new senators, and in particular Senator Bosa.

● (1520)

I am doubly happy about his appointment, not only because he is, as I am, of Italian origin but knowing how valuable he is

I am sure he will be able to make an important contribution to Canadian society.

There is often talk about unity. People are asking a multitude of questions about unity—why unity? What can we do or what should be done to safeguard unity?

But rarely is the question asked, why are there people who want to separate from Canada? Why are there people who are dissatisfied with the present situation in Canada?

I for one, honourable senators, looked around me, asked myself a lot of questions and finally came to the conclusion that I should deal mainly with the issue of education which is basic to everything.

That is definitely where we have fallen short of the mark in the past. Furthermore, the problems now emerging in the formation of our young Canadians, in orientation and education all come from that.

When I talk of education, I want to bring to your attention the fact that all across Canada in every region in every province there is a history to be found. I am convinced that that is where there is a lack, especially in the teaching of history to our young Canadians. Let me give you here a very striking example.

If two young students were brought here to this house, one having gone to French school and the other to English school, and you asked the young French-speaking student: "Who discovered Canada?", he would answer without a moment of hesitation "Jacques Cartier". Now, if you put the same question to the young English-speaking student, he would tell you "John Cabotto".

We would then face a real problem because we would have involuntarily created a disagreement between those two students who both believe that they are right. However, they are both right because the first one learned from his teacher that it was Jacques Cartier and the second that it was John Cabotto. In that case, who is to blame?

I believe that you will understand, honourable senators, the need and the urgency of having only one Canadian history for all Canadians without exception. This history should talk about Canada and relate the true facts. If the discoverer of Canada is Jacques Cartier, it should be so for everyone, and if it is John Cabotto, so be it.

For my part, I am convinced that as concerns teaching it is essential to provide for English to be taught in French schools and for French to be taught in English schools throughout Canada. It is extremely important for all Canadians to respect both official languages first before wishing to learn another language, such as Spanish, Italian, German and so on.

The real way to reinforce Canadian unity is human contact and the knowledge that all Canadians have the same aspirations, whether they speak French or English.

There is another factor I would like to note about certain teachers or union members who have often had experiences leading to rather serious confrontations with our governments. I could mention cases like that of the Quebec Teachers'

Corporation which on several occasions refused to apply partially certain laws like Bill 63, Bill 22 and Bill 24.

As concerns especially Bills 63 and 22, among all the points related to teaching, it was made clear that teachers had the responsibility to teach English in French schools. They never bothered with this provision and in fact they never did teach English, in spite of the wish of the great majority of Quebecers. This has been proven not long ago by a poll showing that 65 to 70 per cent of parents openly urged that English be taught to their children going to French schools.

The president of this corporation, Mr. Charbonneau, is very glad to speak about respecting the wish of the majority of Quebecers when the question of promoting the French language in Quebec is at issue. But suddenly he becomes deaf when we say that English should be taught in French schools and, strangely enough, the majority rule does not apply anymore.

I believe that in our schools we should first concern ourselves with the education and the development of our children in an objective way and prepare them to form a society which can cope with the problems they will have to face and thus continue the society wanted by the large majority of Canadians: a healthy society, a society with respect for democracy and where social peace prevails.

As I did you probably all read the statement made two weeks ago by Mr. Charbonneau concerning his participation in the conference on the economic direction of Quebec as a representative of a leftist party because, according to him, the party in power is not really a leftist formation.

I for one would say to Mr. Charbonneau that if he wishes to try his hand at politics he is free to do so but first he should resign as president of the Quebec Teachers' Corporation.

When we know that teachers have a basic influence on the orientation and the education of our youth, we cannot let them do what they wish and orient our society in a direction that will not have been chosen or wanted by the majority of Canadians.

Our youth will not be responsible, because it will have been manipulated by a small group of extremists who play at politics and want to legislate, yet show no respect for laws passed by our existing governments.

To conclude, honourable senators, I wish to underline the importance of the role which each one of us will have to play in our respective provinces as regards our minorities.

When people say that Quebec should be a French-speaking province like Ontario is English-speaking, I agree, but we must insist on the fact that just as Quebec must not infringe upon the rights of the English-speaking minority within its boundaries, so must the rights of French-speaking minorities not be encroached upon in English-speaking provinces. Therefore we should make sure that everybody can rightfully say he or she is a full-fledged citizen.

As I said, it is very important that every citizen—whether English in Quebec or French in another province with an English-speaking majority—should respect the other minority, its customs, while taking into account and respecting both official languages of this country.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

SCIENCE POLICY

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Lamontagne: I should like to remind the members of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy that the committee will hold what will probably be its last meeting immediately after the adjournment of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 26, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HONOURABLE THOMAS D'ARCY LEONARD

TRIBUTES

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before the business of the day is proceeded with, I should like to inform the Senate, those of my colleagues who do not already know, that our late colleague, Senator D'Arcy Leonard, died in Toronto yesterday.

Senator Leonard retired from the Senate on April 29, 1970, on his 75th birthday, so he was 82 at the time of his death. We do not as a rule pay tributes to members of the Senate on their death, if death is subsequent to their retirement from the Senate. But on this occasion I think it is highly appropriate to say something, because Senator Leonard, as all honourable senators who knew him would agree, was one of the very distinguished—the word is illustrious—members of this house. At the time he retired we said of him that he had four careers. He had been a soldier, a lawyer, a very distinguished businessman, and for 15 years a member of this Parliament.

One of his great contributions to the Senate was as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance; but the general work of the chamber benefited greatly from the advice, judgment and sagacity of Senator Leonard. I remember that on one occasion he sponsored a bill which had to do with the closing of a hospital in Muskoka, I believe it was one which had been devoted to the care of patients suffering from tuberculosis. It was rather significant that Senator Leonard should sponsor that bill, since after the first World War he had been confined to that same hospital with tuberculosis. He spoke very effectively on that occasion about the great strides that had been made in the control of this disease, at one time thought to be so deadly as to be practically impossible to cure, to the point at which it was possible for the institution in question to be closed.

Senator Leonard was not only active in the business and professional life of the country, as well as in its public life, he was particularly effective in his native city of Toronto in work connected with its hospitals and universities, and, indeed, with the work of universities throughout Ontario.

On the occasion of his retirement Senator Flynn used what is, I think, a very telling phrase with regard to D'Arcy Leonard, when he called him "a total person". I think that all of us who knew him would agree that was indeed a very apt description of the man.

It would have been a great experience for the younger and newer members of this chamber to have known Senator Leonard. He has left many legacies here. On the occasion of his retirement, on April 23, 1970, he said this, if I might just quote one paragraph from his speech:

I have said before that I have been very proud to be a member of this chamber. I am a great believer in the second chamber in the federal institution, and have been ever since I first studied constitutional law. I leave it now, after nearly 15 years, believing that as far as the Senate of Canada is concerned it is a much stronger and more effective body than it has ever been. So, for whatever I may have tried to do in participating in its activities, I am certainly more than repaid by the feeling that this has been something well worth doing. It is something that is continuing in greater degree and, I hope, is of far greater importance to the Government of Canada than it has ever been in the past.

I called Senator Leonard on the occasion of his birthday, on April 29 last. I was not able to get him because he was playing golf. His final illness must have come very suddenly.

To his wife Lilian and to all the members of the family I am sure all of us extend our very deep sympathy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am deeply shocked and saddened at the news of the death of our former colleague, Senator Leonard. I only learned of it as I came into the chamber today. What I said at the time of his retirement bears repeating. Senator Leonard was a great senator. He was a civilized man. He was a gentleman, a gentleman in the sense of the 17th century French word "gentilhomme"; that is, a man who was concerned with all areas of activity.

As Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance he did a tremendous job, and he did it in a way which was always so charming as it was efficient. He did a lot for the Senate. He had a wonderful career. I am very sorry at his passing, and I join with Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) in offering his wife and his family the heartfelt condolences of the official opposition.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, in January of 1956 thirteen new senators took their seats in this chamber, and among them was Senator Leonard. I was very pleased to be on that list. During the 15 years he was here I got to know him extremely well. I worked on several committees with him. I was for a while Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which he chaired so ably. I feel that his contribution to this chamber, and through it to this country, should not in any sense be underemphasized, because he was, as has just been said, a great man.

Senator Leonard's contribution generally was important, but perhaps the manner in which he did things was his greatest contribution to the Senate. He had wisdom; he was gentle; he was humble; he was firm. He had the highest integrity. He dealt with all matters, including those which involved emotion or feeling, with delicacy and understanding. He loved people. He respected the ideas of people. In the course of his work in the Senate, some of those attributes, it is hoped, brushed off on the rest of us. Those of us who knew him, particularly those of us who knew him well, are the better for having known him.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Capital and Operating Budgets of the Canadian National Railways for the year ending December 31, 1977, pursuant to section 37(2) of the Canadian National Railways Act, Chapter C-10 and section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1977-895, dated March 30, 1977, approving same.

Copies of document on a transportation program for the Atlantic Provinces, together with press release announcing federal approval of the said program and copy of the telex sent to each of the four Atlantic Premiers, issued by the Department of Transport.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE BUDGETS TABLED

Senator Laird, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled reports approving budgets of the following committees:

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Special Senate Committee on Science Policy.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday next, May 31, 1977, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, June 1, 1977, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, May 30, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to give a brief explanation of the motion. In speaking to the adjournment motion last week in my absence, Senator Petten mentioned that it would probably be necessary for the Senate to commence Monday evening sittings starting next week. In moving that the Senate do adjourn until Monday evening next, I have taken into consideration the number of bills still on the order paper at the second reading stage, as well as those that have been referred to committee, and the various other matters that are before committees of the Senate.

In addition, we can expect to receive two or three bills from the House of Commons early next week. In order to deal effectively with the legislation before the Senate and to make workable arrangements for the necessary committee meetings, I think we had better count on sitting on Mondays until the summer adjournment.

On Tuesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to begin its examination of the subject matter of Bill C-42, the Competition Bill. The National Finance Committee has scheduled a meeting for 2.30 p.m. on Public Works estimates.

On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. and at 2.30 p.m. There will be a number of items before this committee, including the white paper on banking legislation, the subject matter of Bill C-16 and such other legislation as may be referred to it. The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will also meet at 3.30 p.m., or when the Senate rises, in connection with its inquiry into the beef industry.

On Thursday morning the National Finance Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to continue its study of Public Works estimates, and the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet at 10 a.m. to deal with Bill C-41, the Maritime Code. At 11 a.m. the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will also meet. On Thursday afternoon the Agriculture Committee will meet at 3.30 p.m., or when the Senate rises, again to continue its inquiry into the beef industry.

There are also some meetings which have not yet been arranged, but there will be additions to this list as those meetings are set down and further legislation is referred to this house.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, on this side we certainly have no objection to sitting next Monday, but the Deputy Leader of the Government has not convinced me, at least, that we would not be capable of accomplishing the work before us by simply sitting on Tuesday night as usual. On the other hand, if he feels sitting Monday night will have the effect of providing a better attendance at the committee meetings on Tuesday morning, that may be a valid reason; but I certainly do not think the volume of work before us is sufficient to justify our beginning a series of Monday night sittings. In any event, if it is the wish of the government side to have the Senate return on Monday, so be it, but I certainly do not see any compelling rush yet to justify such a motion.

Senator Langlois: As I said in my statement in support of this motion, honourable senators, we have studied the program presently before us and what can be expected from the other place early next week, and have concluded that the only orderly way of arranging for the reasonably speedy disposal of the legislation before this house is at least to initiate the Monday evening sittings next week. I did not intend to suggest as a hard and fast rule that the Senate would meet on Monday evenings every week from now until the adjournment; I have merely said that we should be prepared to commence that routine next Monday in order to endeavour to dispose of the legislation which is likely to come to us before the summer adjournment. Incidentally, as I understand it, that adjournment is presently scheduled to take place some time during the last part of June.

Senator Choquette: Honourable senators, if I may make the suggestion, commencing Monday we should stop saying, "Stand! Stand! Stand!" for every item on the order paper.

Senator Flynn: Yes. That could be done just as easily on Tuesday as on Monday.

Motion agreed to.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE INQUIRY

REPORT—REPRESENTATIONS FROM NORTHWEST TERRITORIES COUNCIL—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Senate whether the government has received representations from the Northwest Territories Council, or any elected member of that Council, about the conclusions and recommendations of the Berger Report.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

Senator Flynn: May I suggest that it would be preferable if Senator Austin could give you notice in advance so that you would not always be obliged to say, "I will take that question as notice."

Senator Austin: Perhaps I should also be giving Senator Flynn notice at the same time.

Senator Flynn: No, no. It would not be necessary. I am not in the same class as Senator Perrault. I think I could probably reply to that question now.

● (1420)

REINTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION—QUESTION

Senator Choquette: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question. This might involve amending the rules. I do not happen to know the answer myself. Every now and then we hear, "This is a bill that died on the order paper in the last session." This is said in reference to a bill that had gone through the whole rigmarole in the other place, had been read the second time in this house and referred to a committee, which had heard witnesses from all over the country. Then, in the next session, we have to start the whole thing all over again.

In order to expedite matters, I am wondering if this could not be remedied in some way by amending the rules. What is the answer to this problem?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand this matter is under consideration at the present time by a number of parties in the other place. I think the senator has made a valid observation. It has been traditional, as honourable senators have pointed out, to have those measures which have not been fully dealt with by Parliament reintroduced in a subsequent session. Parliament is examining ways now to expedite the people's business more effectively and efficaciously. Certainly the suggestion advanced by the honourable senator is under discussion—that is, completing the debate on a measure which may have been partially debated prior to the conclusion of a previous session of Parliament.

Senator Grosart: It is a rule of the other place, but not here.

Senator Choquette: We could make the suggestion to them.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

AGREEMENTS BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: I have the answer to a question asked on May 11 by the Honourable Senator Manning, which is as follows:

—with respect to the contract . . . between the Government of Canada and the Province of New Brunswick for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, could he [the Leader of the Government] inform the house if all provinces which previously had these agreements have now entered into new agreements, or, if not, what is the present status of those negotiations?

The reply is as follows:

All the provinces which previously had agreements with the Government of Canada for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have now entered into new agreements with the exception of Alberta. Agreement in principle has been reached with this province and all that remains to be done before the agreement is signed is the initialling of a minor amendment thereto.

FISHERIES

VIOLATIONS OF COASTAL JURISDICTION—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Smith (Colchester) asked a question on May 5 which refers to the extension of Canada's offshore jurisdiction of 200 miles. He asked whether any foreign ships have been found fishing within that limit without proper authority and, if so, where, when, what ships, what nationality, and what action has been taken in relation to each.

Since the extension of Canadian Fisheries Zone to 200 miles on January 1, 1977, two foreign fishing vessels have been apprehended fishing without proper authority within this limit.

The first, a Norwegian vessel, the Bergbjorn, was intercepted on February 17, and subsequently escorted to St. John's, Newfoundland, by the Canadian Coast Guard Vessel, John Cabot. At the time of interception, the Bergbjorn was fishing without a licence approximately 163 miles east of Belle Isle, Newfoundland. In St. John's the captain was charged with violation of the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act on two counts: entering into the Canadian zone without the required 24 hours' notice, and fishing without a licence in Canadian fisheries waters. As a result, fines totalling $5,000 were imposed, and the vessel's request for a licence to fish was refused.

On April 17, the U.S.S.R. vessel, the Ritsa, was reported by tracker aircraft to be fishing off the Avalon Peninsula. Interception by the DFE patrol vessel Nonia confirmed that the Soviet vessel had been conducting a directed fishery for capelin one day prior to the effective date of her licence. The vessel was escorted to St. John's where the captain faced charges of conducting an unauthorized fishery in Canadian fisheries waters and was fined a total of $2,500.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATISTICS AS OF MARCH 31, 1977—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Senator Phillips inquired of the government pursuant to notice of April 26:

1. How many persons were receiving Unemployment Insurance benefits in each province as of March 31, 1977?

2. How many persons were registered for employment in each province as of March 31, 1977?

3. How many persons were employed in each province as of March 31, 1977?

Senator Perrault: Honourables senators, I have provided a written reply to Senator Phillips' inquiry of April 26. He may or may not have received it, but the information is as follows:

1. This information is maintained by Statistics Canada and can be found in publication #73-001 entitled "Statistical Report on the Operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act". This information is available for the period ending February 1977.

2. and 3.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I would like to thank the Leader of the Government for his exhaustive efforts in obtaining this information for me.

I have had a very short time in which to study the document, but it is most interesting to note that 1,377,000 Canadians were registered for employment at a time when the government stated that 870,000 were unemployed. This is a difference of 507,000 Canadians seeking employment, and not being listed in the government statistics. Admittedly a small proportion of these may already be employed and seeking to improve their employment, but the large proportion, we can safely assume, are unemployed. This means that approximately a half million Canadians are being used as hidden unemployed.

The subject is too large to deal with in the question period, and I will, at the next sitting of the Senate, give notice of an inquiry dealing with unemployment and the methods of calculating statistics on unemployment.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would not like any member of this chamber to presume that this alleged discrepancy in unemployment figures constitutes a suggestion that the government is being less than candid with the Canadian people.

There are, of course, various ways to measure unemployment. There is the statistical survey of unemployment, taken monthly as honourable senators are aware. The question is along these general lines: Are you out of work and would you like to work? I think the survey ages range from 14 to 65 years, but perhaps that is now changed. Then there is another figure developed from those registered at unemployment insurance offices for unemployment insurance benefits. There are, then, two different types of figures.

When we compare unemployment in Canada with that in some other nations, we should also bear in mind that in some countries only those are listed as unemployed who actually make the physical move to an employment office established by the government and fill in a form to state that they are actively seeking work. And so there are certain situations which are certainly not comparable with any unemployment figures that we develop in Canada.

The government has not misused its statistics. The honourable senator asked for information about those receiving unemployment insurance benefits, how many persons were registered for unemployment, and so on, and that is somewhat different from the monthly statistical survey taken by the agencies of the government involved in doing surveys of the labour force.

Senator Flynn: May I suggest to the government leader that he should not get excited about the comments made by Senator Phillips. I say that because as far as statistics are concerned, if he had been in the other place or here when Senator Martin was operating the "Martin Bureau of Statistics on Unemployment" he would have been even more confused than he is today. I remember when Senator Martin used to comment "Tory times are hard times," and I get a chuckle just wondering what he would say today with the figures on unemployment being what they are.

Senator Langlois: He has been gone a long time.

Senator Flynn: His memory is still very vivid in my mind.

Senator Langlois: You never forget the beatings you got at his hands.

Senator Flynn: He hasn't forgotten those he got from me.

Senator Langlois: Slaps on the back, that is all.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Austin for the second reading of Bill C-309, respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, when I adjourned the debate it was to provide the Leader of the Government with an opportunity to give replies to some of the questions put by me and by other senators who participated in this debate, namely, Senator Grosart and Senator Hicks.

Senator Perrault: Will you allow me to make a statement, senator? Are you prepared to resume your place?

Senator Flynn: Yes, I will when I am finished, but first I want to say that I still believe the bill as it comes to us cannot receive second reading unless we have something specific on which to make a decision. The bill as it is certainly should not receive approval in principle. Now I yield to the Leader of the Government for his statement.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know the sponsor of this bill will wish to reply in greater detail to some of the very pertinent observations made by Senator Grosart and the honourable the Leader of the Opposition in yesterday's debate, as well as those made by the Honourable Senator Hicks.

At the outset I want to reply to the question as to whether this is a government bill. Of course it is not a government bill; it is a public bill in the hands of a private member. It enjoyed a substantial amount of support in the other chamber, involving not only support from the majority of government members but, I understand, support from other parties as well.

Secondly, the sponsor of this proposed piece of legislation pointed out that in his view a number of defects in the bill existed. But what we are really talking about in any second reading debate is the principle of the bill, and, honourable senators, it seems to me, and I think it is a fair assessment of this proposed measure—

Senator Flynn: You mean to the government?

Senator Perrault: I am not saying this as an official statement by the government. I am speaking—

Senator Flynn: But that is what I was asking you to do.

Senator Perrault: Senator, just let me conclude my remarks, will you?

The principle of this bill is to be found in clause 4, sub-clauses (a) and (b), which are as follows:

The Institute may

(a) encourage and promote the establishment in Canada of an industry producing solar energy equipment and parts;

(b) undertake intensive research leading to the development of a technology that will permit the use of solar energy for domestic and industrial purposes as a viable alternative to non-renewable resources—

I think we all support the principle that we should have development of solar energy equipment and parts, and we support the principle of research leading to the development of a technology.

It seems to me that what we should do is get this bill into committee as quickly as possible so that all of the important questions which have been asked by the opposition and others may be answered. I understand the sponsor of the bill has offered to appear before the committee, and I would think that the committee might wish to call certain other witnesses. It may be that this proposal in its detail and in its suggestion that we establish an institute for solar energy application is not the appropriate course of action, but certainly the Senate can support the principle that we need research into this important field. And this is really all I want to bring to the debate this afternoon; that is, to suggest that we can all certainly support the principle.

Let us get the bill into committee where a detailed examination can be made. If honourable senators do not believe that it merits support, after probing the reasons for the institute and so on, then let them reject it.

Senator Flynn: The principle of this bill is not the study of solar energy; it is the creation of an institute, and we want to know what kind of a creature you are proposing to us. We don't know. This is the principle of the bill.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to say a word or two about this bill. I must confess that I agree with Senator Flynn that the principle of the bill is not that we approve of and want to encourage research into solar energy. The principle is whether or not we believe we should establish an institute to do this.

We have heard the technical difficulties which have been referred to, but there is more than a technical difficulty with respect to this bill. We are asked to approve a bill setting up an institute when there is no indication of who is to be behind it and who is to operate it. It is completely contrary to all the principles held by the Senate. Whenever the Senate approves the incorporation of a corporation of any kind by a special act it always insists on knowing who is behind it. They must know who are the first directors. They must be named in the special act. That is very important.

The same principle applies to the Bank Act. If a private bill is brought in to incorporate a bank, we have to follow the form set out in the schedule of the Bank Act. It sets out the people who are to be the provisional directors. That is very relevant. The same applies to the incorporation of an insurance company by special act.

I agree with Senator Perrault that this bill should be considered by a committee. But I do not agree that the principle of the bill should be approved by the Senate at this time. We have a very simple procedure. We can refer it to committee without approving the principle. We can have the sponsor of the bill before the committee, and the committee can report back. We can then consider what is presented to the committee—we would want to know who will be the provisional directors, for example—and we can then resume the debate.

Therefore, I move, seconded by Senator Cook, that the bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for examination and report.

The effect of my motion will be that the bill will be taken off the order paper for the time being, it will stop the debate at this particular moment, but it will come back on to the order paper for debate on second reading at a later date when the committee makes its report.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cottreau, that this bill be now read a second time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that this bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for examination and report.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I wish to speak on the motion in amendment. If the motion in amendment is not approved, do I understand that I shall then be allowed to speak on the motion itself?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I am sorry that Senator Godfrey has seen fit to move this amendment, because I believe this bill is deserving of support on second reading. I believe that the bill offers a very useful advance for the development of a solar energy program in Canada.

Senator Godfrey's suggestion that the bill go to committee without approval on second reading would put the Senate in the position of refusing to make any comment in support of a badly needed solar energy program. I would compare that position with the position taken by the other place, where the bill received support from every party and where the sponsor was encouraged to proceed with the bill and thus provide the public with a higher degree of awareness of the importance of solar energy in our society.

I urge honourable senators to accept the bill in principle on second reading. In my introduction I indicated that the bill was defective in its drafting, that it set up an inchoate organization, that many provisions with respect to the establishment of the institute would have to be amended by the Senate before it could pass the bill. I said also that there was a crying need in this country for a program of this kind, that there is a crying need for an institute which, as conceived by the bill, would act as a bridge between the public and private sectors.

Honourable senators, the purpose of the creation of the institute is to put in the private sector an organization to be run by people in the private sector, to provide a higher level of consciousness and awareness by the Canadian people of the role of solar energy; to seek funds from both private and public sources; to conduct that program of education and awareness; and to do research in the area of the commercial application of technology. It will not seek to do basic and primary research of the kind done by the National Research Council, by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, or any other agency. It will take that research and promote its commercial application by companies in the private sector.

In addition, as is clearly stated, the bill seeks to promote the use of solar energy in Canada. The institute, as a concept, is a desirable one. There is no similar agency in this country which now provides, on a full-time basis, that type of direction or which gives promise of that type of coordination and organization. I did not say, in my introductory remarks, that the institute would do the research, or that it would have an exclusive part of any research or even commercial application program. I did say that it would make a valuable contribution in that area if it were created and allowed to proceed.

Honourable senators, the creation of the institute should be encouraged and supported, and the role of the Senate is in the proper modelling of this particular institute so that those tasks can be performed.

Therefore, I ask honourable senators to defeat Senator Godfrey's amendment and allow the bill to proceed to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where those who seek the creation of this institute can describe its purposes and its organization and deal with amendments that are required, and where scientific witnesses, as well as those from the field of commercial application, can give evidence as to the pressing need for a higher level, an advanced technological level, of solar energy effort in this country.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin. Can the honourable senator tell us the names of those who will take on the responsibility of running this institute, either by way of being directors or members? If not, would we not be simply creating something that will float in mid-air for someone to grab at some particular time?

Senator Austin: I have no names. If this institute is created by an act of Parliament, there will be provision as to how its members will be recruited. I am sure that responsible Canadian citizens will come forward to further the objectives of this entity.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the sponsor of the bill? Do I understand that this proposed institute would be a private institution?

Senator Austin: Yes, it would be a private institution, but it would, of course, make representations to government and seek to work in that area which, as Senator Lamontagne knows so well, is deficient—that is, the area of coordination of public and private activity.

Senator Lamontagne: It seems to me, honourable senators, that if it is to be a private institution, financed by whatever means, and regardless of whether it has access to public funds or not, it does not need an act of Parliament in order to come into existence. It has only to seek incorporation in the ordinary way.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, that point was the subject of an argument by Senator Grosart yesterday, and I have not replied to it on the basis that I would have an opportunity to do so later in the debate. Let me say that a major reason why the creation of this institute by Parliament would be in the public interest is that Canadians are notoriously unready to deal with changes in patterns of energy consumption, conservation and price. It is clear from the scientific evidence—some of which I gave in my introduction, and of which I have more to give—that solar energy will have to play an important part in home and space heating in this country. An institute of this kind, as approved by Parliament, would put the stamp of recognition of Parliament on the critical nature of the energy problem and the critical need to advance in the solar sector.

Senator Grosart: May I ask Senator Austin a question? Would he not agree that the passing of this bill would create a precedent for bills setting up institutes of geothermal research, of tidal and hydraulic research, and of wind research, all of which forms of energy, according to the latest reports, will eventually make a more important contribution to filling the energy gap than solar energy? Does he not anticipate that this will create a precedent, and that we will be taking up the time of Parliament in setting up these kinds of institutions throughout the whole field of energy and scientific research and development?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, as I said in my opening remarks on May 18, all of those forms of energy—tidal, geothermal and wind—I would include within the definition of renewable energy resources and of solar energy resources. They would be part of the program of this particular institute.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the sponsor of the bill, then, if he is really saying that a solar energy application institute, such as is proposed, will go so far beyond the terms of the bill that it will actually take in other fields of energy research over and above that which Parliament would permit it to do? Is he really telling Parliament that if we pass this bill this institute, in its activities, intends to go away beyond the approval given by Parliament?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, as I said on May 18, the bill is deficient in that it contains no definition of solar energy. I gave such a definition in those remarks which was inclusive of the energy forms just mentioned. I do not believe that Parliament can be offended in any particular way by the passing of this bill by the other place. In terms of the rules of statutory interpretation, I believe that when Parliament speaks, or, at least, when one house of Parliament speaks, something of value is presumed to have been said, and in this case the other house has given us a bill. I presume that that house considers this bill to be of value. What I would like this chamber to do is make it a valuable, coherent, concise and better-oriented piece of legislation.

Senator Grosart: I would ask the sponsor if he would reply to my question. Does this institute intend to go beyond the terms of reference given it by Parliament? Does it intend, as I believe he has just suggested, to be an institute dealing with geothermal, tidal and wind energy sources, none of which, by any possible stretch of the imagination, can be called solar energy?

Senator Austin: All the scientific literature, senator, describes solar, tidal and wind forms as part of the solar energy system.

Senator Grosart: Oh, please. I have to ask the sponsor if he really believes what he has just said, that geothermal power, which comes out of the bowels of the earth, can be described as solar energy, or that wind can be described as solar energy? There are divisions in the government service, all of which deal with these separately.

Senator Perrault: Ask your questions in committee, and then there will be no problem.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources there is the office of renewable energy sources, and all of those items are dealt with in that one office. I wonder if Senator Grosart realizes that the sun is responsible for most forms of energy on earth.

Senator Grosart: Then I would ask the sponsor of the bill if he is really saying that because the sun is responsible for all forms of energy, this institute is going to investigate sex.

Senator Austin: I am open to an amendment from you to that effect, Senator Grosart.

Senator Grosart: You are making stupid statements.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think the motion proposed by Senator Godfrey is very reasonable in the circumstances. It would permit the Senate not to approve the principle of the bill before we have the necessary answers to the questions we are asking. The principle of this bill is not the study of solar energy, whatever that may be, but the creation of an institute. We have before us a bill which is not even a skeleton, not even half a skeleton. There is nothing there.

The Senate is asked to approve the principle of creating an institute concerning which we know nothing—nothing as to its composition, nothing as to its funding. That is insolent nonsense. All that Senator Austin, the sponsor of the bill, has given us about the intent of the institute are empty words. Nobody over there has been able to tell us exactly what the composition of this institute will be. It is the brainchild of a private member in the other place. But once it has been created, who will take it over? What will the institute do? Where will the members come from? We certainly cannot approve any bill that offers us nothing more than pious hopes that it will prove to be a good thing. We cannot incorporate any institute without knowing exactly what the definitive status of that creation will be.

I suggest that the motion made by Senator Godfrey is the only logical one. We should refer the bill to the committee. The committee would then report and we would probably say, "This bill would be acceptable if we had amendments along these lines," and so on. Then we would know what we were talking about.

I suggest to Senator Austin that he does not know what he is talking about when he expounds on the ideas behind the bill. There is nothing in this bill and nobody behind the bill which would justify his speaking in the way he has. If the Senate is going to be asked to make an act of faith, then, honourable senators, the last man I would have broach the subject to me is Senator Austin.

Senator Choquette: As the thing stands now I suggest that we cannot even give it a solar second thought.

Senator Perrault: Senator, that isn't bad.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition has built an almost unassailable case for getting this matter into committee as quickly as possible so that we may ask these questions. The sponsor of the bill will be there, since he has committed himself to appearing, and we can decide at that time, surely, whether it is in the public interest to proceed with the establishment of this institute. The sponsor of the bill proclaims, and has proclaimed, both in the other chamber and to anyone he has discussed the matter with, that the principle of this bill, in his assessment and view, is the furtherance of an industry producing solar energy equipment in part and also intensive research into technology. He states and proclaims that is the principle of the bill. He said that in the other place.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, you and I may disagree with his assessment of what that principle may be, but I suggest to honourable senators here who have had considerable experience in legislatures and in Parliament that it is an entirely usual and ordinary procedure to give second reading support in principle to a great range of measures, then to change them in committee, and ultimately to either approve or reject them on third reading.

Senator Flynn: I disagree.

Senator Perrault: I think we are making too much of this issue. I think this is a good bill. I think the spirit of the bill is desirable, the principle is supportable, and I suggest that we get along with the job of approving it in principle and getting it into committee. I am sure the committee can hear the important observations that Senator Grosart and others may wish to make. It really is an almost unprecedented procedure to refer the content without at least giving it approval in principle.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators—

Senator Argue: You can speak more than once at this stage.

Senator Grosart: It is not a question of speaking more than once. I am rising to speak in support of the amendment. I have previously asked some questions.

Senator Argue: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: If honourable senators opposite care to read the proceedings, they will find that in every case I asked a specific question, and I did not go beyond it.

Senator Perrault: We are not criticizing you.

Senator Grosart: Speaking to the amendment, I would say first of all that obviously the principle of the bill is not in support of solar energy as such, or of research into solar energy. The principle of the bill is clearly stated. It is for Parliament to establish, by an act of Parliament, a specific institute. It is an institute which may or may not decide to make a profit. It is an institute which may or may not have shareholders. It is an institute which may or may not be subject to audit.

The principle before Parliament is: Should we give approval at this stage to the principle of a bill of this kind, approving it in principle in the Senate? It is all very well for the Leader of the Government or the sponsor to say, "There have been assurances given." The sponsor in the other place has said this. The sponsor here has said this.

Senator Austin started to give us a lecture on the interpretation of statutes. I do not know how much study he has made of that particular subject, but I assure him that I should be very glad to sit in on a consortium with him at any time, if I can help him in his understanding of the principles of the interpretation of statutes. Certainly, it is no part of the principle of the interpretation of statutes that some comment made in respect of a bill, some assurance that is given, even by a cabinet minister, has anything whatsoever to do with the final authority or the final interpretation of that bill by the courts. If we give approval in principle to this bill we are giving approval in principle to an institute that can be a runaway institute, that can cause unbelievable problems in the future. Because if we do it with this bill we may create a precedent to do it with many others.

To my mind it is absurd, and I agree entirely with Senator Godfrey that if we approve the principle that this Senate will approve the principle of such bills, anyone can come in and say, "I want you to establish an institute for me. I won't tell you whether I am going to make a profit. I won't tell you if I have got shareholders. I will tell you nothing about it. I won't tell you if we have members. I will just tell you that we are limited; we must have twelve and not more than twenty-five directors." That is all. The bill itself authorizes—and this adds to the danger—this institute to collect money from the public. It authorizes the institute to seek money from the government. But there is no indication whatsoever of the control of that, which has always been the essence of our discussion of any such private bill, which in effect is what it is, to establish a private company with practically no knowledge of its structure, no knowledge of its handling of money, no control whatsoever.

For that reason I support Senator Godfrey's amendment, seconded by Senator Cook, that the substance of this bill be referred to the committee. It can be discussed there, without it going to that committee with the stamp of approval of the Senate, which it would have if we approved it in principle.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the sponsor if this is indeed a private bill, as is my understanding?

Senator Austin: It is a private member's public bill.

Senator Flynn: How public? What makes it public?

Senator Austin: You were in the other place, Senator Flynn. You know what a private member's public bill is.

Senator Flynn: What is a private member's public bill?

Senator Grosart: Define it.

Senator Austin: I am amazed that you should ask me to define it.

Senator Grosart: Don't be amazed.

Senator Argue: A public bill in the name of a private member.

Senator Flynn: Why is it public?

Senator Argue: Because it has to do with a public question.

Senator Flynn: Oh!

Senator Austin: Of course.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, in the middle of a discussion on the definition of private or public bills, might I call your attention to rule 94, which states:

After its first reading and before its consideration by any other committee, a private bill from the House of Commons, for which no petition has been received by the Senate, shall be taken into consideration and reported on by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders in like manner as a petition.

I wonder if we have complied with our own rules in this respect.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I think the bill is perfectly in order. I think it is a public bill. It is a bill to deal with a public question in the name of a private member. I introduced many public bills in my day in the House of Commons, and others have done the same, and they are doing it today by the hundreds.

Senator Grosart: Nobody objects to that.

Senator Argue: This is one of those public bills in the name of a private member. I think the member who introduced the bill in the other place should be congratulated on the form of the bill. It is a far-reaching bill. It has to do with a very important subject. It is introduced by a private member, and he is able to introduce it and get around the question of its being an appropriation bill by saying in clause 5:

Nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to require an appropriation of public revenue or an expenditure out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

The amendment moved by Senator Godfrey is a negative amendment. It is an amendment that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a committee. That is an old trick. "Trick" is the wrong word, but it is an old method that is often used to kill a bill. You don't really dare vote against the bill on second reading and kill it that way, so you endeavour to kill it by moving that the bill be not now read a second time. That is the negative, and that is the way it is killed. The subject matter is referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where they go on a fishing expedition; they inquire generally into the subject, and that is where it ends.

I am no expert on the rules; that's for sure, and I bow to Senator Grosart on that. However, it seems to me that there is a rule which says you do not discuss the same question twice in the same session. If we kill this bill through adoption of this negative motion, which is a proper motion and one which is designed to kill the bill, then that would kill the bill for the balance of this session. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee can study the subject, but the rules do not allow the reintroduction of a bill during the same session.

• (1500)

I do not think the Senate needs to be afraid of the Senate. This is the last institution I am afraid of. I cannot see this house getting so revolutionary that it is going to pass a bill that is going to do all of the terrible things that have been suggested, and that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, of all committees of this house, is going to let this revolutionary bill, somehow or another, get out of that committee and back into the chamber, at which time the revolutionists within the Senate chamber will pass this terrible bill with all of the dire consequences that flow therefrom. I think the Senate—

Senator Flynn: Don't get excited. You are getting more excited than any one of us.

Senator Argue: That's right. I don't mind getting excited. There is nothing wrong with being excited.

Senator Grosart: Make some sense.

Senator McElman: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Argue: Certainly.

Senator McElman: If there were such a referral of the subject matter to committee, is there anything to prevent the committee from making a report and returning the bill to the house?

Senator Argue: I am subject to correction on these matters, but I would think that if we took this negative attitude it would preclude us under the rules from discussing the same type of bill in the same session.

Senator McElman: But could the committee not return the same bill to the chamber?

Senator Argue: But we would have defeated the bill if we adopted this negative motion. In any event, that is my position; that is my understanding. I do not think the question removes the validity of what I have said; namely, that this is a negative motion. And the way to handle a negative motion, if you are positively in favour of this bill, is to defeat it. I am not afraid of the bill. To my mind we could pass the principle of the bill. We could take a chance on the learned members of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee dealing with the bill in a fair and reasonable manner. I am sure that committee would not return to the chamber a bill that would not warrant our sympathetic and immediate consideration.

So, I am going to vote against the amendment. If the amendment is defeated, it is my intention to support the bill.

Senator Austin: Might I ask the honourable senator whether he would agree that, if the motion for second reading of the bill were adopted and the bill was referred to committee, the committee would be obligated to work on the bill and refer it back to the Senate in an improved form? That would not be the case if the bill had not received second reading.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Argue: I would think that is right, and the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee would decide, after hearing all the evidence, whether it wished to go forward with the bill, with some necessary amendments. If the committee thought that the bill should not be proceeded with, it would refer it back to the chamber with that kind of report. In any event, the Senate will deal with the bill on third reading. If at the third reading stage I see the bill as having many objectionable features, I would not hesitate to change my vote. A bill does not become law until it has received three readings in the House of Commons, three readings in the Senate, and royal assent.

Some Hon. Senators: Question!

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to point out that it was not my intention, in moving this motion, to kill the bill. I spoke to the Clerk this morning to determine the effect of such a motion. I was told that it would be perfectly in order and that the committee, when it reported back, would simply request that the bill be restored to the order paper to be proceeded with. The intention is not to kill the bill. The purpose of the motion is to enable us, when we continue the debate on second reading, to know more about what the bill will look like in its final form.

Senator Grosart: Of course.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I raised a point of order and I should like to have it dealt with. I do not know how important it is, except that half of this discussion has been on the question of whether it is right or wrong to refer this bill to committee at this stage. In that respect, I should like to know whether or not rule 94 applies.

Senator Flynn: On the point of order, we have to decide whether it is a private or public bill. I agree it was privately initiated. About that, there is no question. However, we are not able to ascertain from the text of the bill whether this is to be a private or public institute.

If I were to rise in the Senate and request the incorporation of an insurance company, that would be a private bill. If I ask for the incorporation of a charitable organization, that, again, would be a private bill. It is only when a bill puts any obligation on the public in general that it can be a public bill.

Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Oh, wait a minute!

Senator Flynn: Well, try to explain your objection. In the case of the establishment of the Canadian Development Corporation, that was done through a public bill, but with private initiative, limited initiative. Any corporation which is not controlled by the government or which has no authority over the public in a given area would be a private corporation. We do not know whether the proposed institute is to be private or public. There is nothing in the bill to indicate the nature of the institute.

The point raised by Senator Molson is a very important one. I suggest that the bill involves the establishment of a private institute. It has not received the approval of the government and there is no government control involved. We do not even know whether the Canada Corporations Act would apply. As I said earlier, the idea in itself may be a good one, but I think the motion now before the house should be adopted. It seems to me that the committee could study the bill at this stage and report back to the Senate that, if it were amended in a given fashion, it could be adopted. The point of order is well taken. I do not think it should be overlooked.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, a point of order has been raised by Senator Molson. I do not feel that this matter is of such importance that we should rush into it. I suggest that Madam Speaker take the point of order under advisement, for a decision on Monday evening.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to speak on the point of order. I want to make two points in reply to Senator Molson, the first of which is that under the rules of the House of Commons this bill is described as a public bill. It is described as a private member's public bill. That is final on the definition of the bill. There can be no doubt it is a public bill.

Senator Molson: If I might make a point, we are not discussing the rules of the House of Commons, Senator Austin. I have asked, on a point of order, for a ruling in the Senate.

Senator Grosart: In the Senate, yes.

Senator Austin: May I say, secondly, that the Senate, by unanimous consent, has proceeded to second reading at this particular point and, therefore, should be taken as not being concerned with its own rules.

Senator Grosart: Where have you been?

Senator Flynn: In the PMO.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I shall take the point of order under advisement. Is the Honourable Senator Deschatelets moving the adjournment of the debate?

Senator Deschatelets: I suggest that Her Honour the Speaker take Senator Molson's point of order under advisement for a decision on Monday evening, if possible. For that purpose I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Deschatelets, debate on motion in amendment adjourned.

PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS MONITORING BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Barrow for the second reading of Bill S-4, to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada.

Hon. Augustus Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Barrow speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill S-4.

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, yesterday I adjourned the debate on second reading of Bill S-4 primarily to enable me to give Senator Grosart, and this chamber, more complete answers to some of his questions.

Senator Grosart asked whether this bill was the right way to go about getting information, and whether the government did not already have the information it was seeking. I am informed that reports with the proposed degree of detail and timeliness are not currently available from any other source, and, as I advised in my remarks yesterday, it was primarily because of the request of some of the companies that such legislation be obtained that this bill is now before us.

Senator Grosart made reference to Schedules I and II to the bill. If reference is made to clause 13 of the bill it will be seen that Schedule I refers to companies incorporated in Canada, whereas Schedule II refers to those incorporated elsewhere.

The companies required to report are those which deal in gas and oil—that is, primary production and exploration. It is my understanding that crown companies do not have to be legislated to report. However, Petro-Canada is required by its own act of incorporation, under section 7(3), to make full disclosure to the minister, and in any case it has voluntarily agreed to do so.

Senator Grosart is quite correct that the minister is being given the same powers as the Minister of National Revenue under the Income Tax Act in the case of suspected violations. I believe the phraseology is taken from the Income Tax Act, and is the same as in the Federal Investment Review Act, the Statistics Act, the AIB Act and the Petroleum and Administration Act.

A question was raised concerning the magnitude of the additional revenues, and what percentage of them the government would require the companies to spend on exploration. Of course, the purpose of the survey is to determine the amount of the additional revenues which are a result of the government's decision to increase the price of domestic crude oil, and to determine how those revenues are being spent.

On page 36 of the booklet, An Energy Strategy for Canada, to which I referred in my original remarks, there are schedules which show the distribution of the incremental net revenues resulting from an increase in the price of crude. In the absence of additional exploration expenditures by industry, the federal government would collect 27 per cent of the additional production profits generated. With an increase in exploration costs of 50 cents per barrel, the federal share will fall to 3 per cent; the provincial share will fall as well, but industry's share will rise from about 25 per cent to 53 per cent. If exploration expenditures increase by 50 cents per barrel, when oil prices rise by $1 per barrel, the federal share of the additional production profits generated could fall to zero.

I thank Senator Grosart for his review of the bill and his comments. If I have not done justice to his questions, perhaps he will be able to receive a more complete explanation in committee, because, if this bill receives second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Perhaps representatives of the petroleum and gas producing industries could be available in committee, as well as officials of the department, to answer any further questions.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Barrow moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND (No. 2)—SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith moved the second reading of Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, the object of this bill is to amend the Customs Tariff. Like Gaul, the bill is divided into three parts and deals with three subjects. The first is products of interest to developing countries; the second is temporary tariff reductions due to the expected expiry on June 30, 1977; and the third is a package of miscellaneous amendments of the kind normally proposed in an annual budget.

Dealing with the first subject or first group, products of interest to developing countries, the tariff reductions on products of special interest to developing countries are provided for in clauses 1, 2 and 4 and in schedules I and III of the bill. They are designed to meet certain requests made by the developing countries in the tropical products group, as it is called, of the Trade Negotiations Conference. They are indicative of the government's desire to do what it can to improve the export earnings and the balance of trade of the developing countries even while the negotiations in Geneva are still in progress.

One of these concessions takes the form of amendments to the general preferential tariff, which applies only to imports from developing countries. Apart from that, the most-favoured-nation tariff is being reduced or removed on a number of other tropical products. They are produced mainly in developing countries. Imports worth about $100 million from developing countries are affected by these two measures.

The second group is comprised of temporary tariff reductions due to expire on June 30, 1977. The intention of the bill is to extend those temporary tariff reductions for another year until June 30, 1978, and clause 3 and schedule II provide for the extension until that date. They deal with reductions on consumer goods which were originally introduced in the budget of February 19, 1973. These tariff cuts apply to about $400 million of imports in the food sector, on the basis of 1976 statistics, and about $1 billion of non-food items such as drugs and pharmaceuticals, kitchen and dinnerware, hand tools, photographic equipment and sporting goods.

I should say there are some changes, but only a limited number of them, being made in these extensions, which can be found in the coverage of temporary reductions which were in force prior to the budget.

There are three of the limited number of changes under group 2 that I should mention specifically. First, the reduced rates on duty on lighting fixtures are being allowed to expire on June 30 in order to help domestic manufacturers in competing against imports. Those will not be extended. Second, the duty on refined sugar is being increased by one fifth of a cent per pound to provide refiners with the minimum amount of protection that the Tariff Board recommended when it reviewed the tariffs on sugar some time ago. However, honourable senators, as you may be aware, the new rates on refined sugar are still below those which were in effect prior to that 1973 budget. They are simply being restored to the levels which were in effect between February 1973 and November 1974.

The third of the class that are to be extended—but which, in this case, are not going to be extended—are tropical products. They are being removed from the temporary measure so that the reduced rates can be continued in force on a permanent basis pursuant to the provisions in the bill relating to concessions for developing countries. That is really a reference back to the first part.

The third subject, as I said, is a package of miscellaneous amendments of a kind that are normally provided in a budget. They are covered by clauses 5 and 6 and schedules IV and V of the bill, and include a provision to make certain machinery and related equipment from Britain and Ireland subject to the 15 per cent most-favoured-nation rate rather than the British preferential tariff of 2½ per cent. I am instructed that this is an amendment decided upon as a result of the study of the tariffs on machinery from Britain and Ireland that was announced in the 1976 budget. As we all know, these two countries withdrew their preferences on Canadian goods when they joined the EEC, and thus we were no longer required to accord preferential tariff treatment to their exports to Canada.

There is also an amendment to tariff item 69605-1. I mention that because it relates to an undertaking given to a Senate committee. It provides for free entry of scientific apparatus, preparations and other goods used by public hospitals and institutions established for religious, educational and scientific purposes. Honourable senators will recall that this item was amended by Bill C-15 insofar as it related to scientific preparations, but that the amendment turned out not to have the desired effect. Temporary relief was provided by an order in council under the Financial Administration Act. When the Minister of Finance appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in connection with the bill, he undertook to amend the item again at the earliest opportunity to give statutory effect to the order in council. That present amendment fulfills that undertaking given to the Senate committee.

The last clause of the bill, clause 7, is the usual provision for the mechanics of implementation. It contains provisions regarding the coming into force of the various clauses and the expiry of the temporary tariff cuts on June 30, 1978. There is, in addition, what I understand to be a normal provision in bills of this kind, a provision for restoring reduced rates of duty—that is, to bring them back up—to their previous levels by order in council prior to June 30, 1978. This is an authority that would be used to deal with any cases where it is judged that continuation of the tariff cut until that date would cause genuine hardship to Canadian producers or workers.

Honourable senators, after second reading, I will move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, it is my intention to move the adjournment of the debate. I presume the honourable sponsor meant to say that if second reading is given he will move that the bill be referred to committee.

Senator Frith: Did I say something wrong, senator?

Senator Grosart: You said that after second reading you will so move, but it is only if the bill receives second reading that you will move. I was referring back to our last discussion.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault, calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I am delighted to take part in this debate on national unity. I wish to thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for giving us the opportunity to express our opinions and our thoughts on such a crucial and vital topic. I also wish to thank and congratulate the senators who have preceded me in this debate—Senator Stewart, Senator Frith, and my confrere Senator Rizzuto, who made a very good speech on national unity yesterday in this honourable chamber.

I was sorry to hear the announcement today of the death of Senator Leonard. I did not know him, and I am sorry that I did not have an opportunity to benefit from his experience. I wish to express to his family and relatives my sincere condolences.

[Translation]

Since this is my maiden speech in the Senate, may I be allowed to express my gratitude to the staff of the Senate for their courtesy and invaluable help in organizing my office.

I also wish to thank most sincerely Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, as well as the many senators who have helped me through their wise counsel and cooperation.

I also take pleasure in thanking the Clerk of the Senate, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, Mrs. LaTrémouille, Mrs. Sutherland, Mrs. Barnwell and Miss Shirley Tink for their valuable assistance. Thank you very much.

[English]

I should also like to express my thanks to the security guards for being so courteous towards me. I can assure you, honourable senators, that they make me feel like a senator. I also draw the attention of the Hansard reporters and interpreters to my accent. I hope it is not too difficult for them to understand me well. We all have some handicaps. I learned how to speak English from a Scotsman while working on a Royal Air Force base in northern Italy. There was a Flying Officer named McRae who taught me a song. I thought it was an English song. I did not find out until three years later, when I came to Canada in 1948, that it was a Scottish song that is sung on those occasions when a person has had a "few." The name of the song is Just a Wee Doch-an-Dorris. I was grateful to him for having given me the opportunity to learn my basic English because when I came to Canada it enabled me to become integrated into Canadian society very quickly.

One of the things that impressed me most about Canada was the fact that people of different religions and racial backgrounds were getting along so well. These people were mostly from Europe, where governments had been at each other's throats for centuries. Instead, here in Canada, as individuals, they worked together in harmony for the betterment of all. As I became involved in clubs, associations, life in the community, and in municipal and federal politics, this feeling that Canada is a somewhat different and unique country grew within me.

Last year I became quite concerned about the kind of thoughts Canadians were expressing in their "Letters to the Editor" in connection with the air pilots' strike, and I was delighted when the Minister of Labour, the Honourable John Munro, who was then the Minister of State responsible for multiculturalism, asked me if I would accept the chairmanship of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism. I accepted that position because I said to myself, "Here is an opportunity for me to do something for my adopted country and for the unity of Canada."

While we have two official languages, or two languages of equal status, in Canada, we do not have an official culture. The Prime Minister, when he announced this policy in the other place, said that the cultures of all the people who live in Canada put together equal the Canadian culture. It is not the Scots, the Welsh, the Irish, the English, the French, the Ukrainian, the German or the Italian—it is all these cultures put together that make the distinctive and colourful culture which is the culture of Canada.

It is a tribute to the Prime Minister, to the government, and to Parliament as a whole that such a policy was adopted which recognizes the reality of the different cultures of the people that live in this country, because this recognition has given millions of people a feeling of belonging to this country. Multiculturalism is not just for the minority groups or ethnic groups, as some people seem to think. It is for all Canadians. Under the multicultural umbrella people can see a little bit of themselves, which makes them feel part and parcel of the fabric of Canadian society. This is a tremendously powerful feeling, honourable senators. It is a powerful feeling which instills loyalty to Canada and greater dedication to national unity.

We at the Multicultural Council believe that cultural values and cultural identity are of primary importance. If an individual, no matter to what ethnic affiliation he belongs, knows that he is accepted by other Canadians and if he knows that he is understood, then that gives him a sense of worth and a sense of belonging that enables him to stand beside other Canadians as an equal partner sharing in the future of this country.

When we speak of culture we sometimes seem to get the wrong impression of what culture is all about, and I should like to give a very brief definition of culture. In addition to the classical aspect of culture—language, painting, music, poetry, literature, sculpture—there is also the more mundane aspect of culture—the traditions, the folklore, the dialects, the food we eat, our way of life. There are some people who take a very simplistic view of life. They say, "Well, why do we have so many cultures? Why do we speak so many languages? Would it not be better if we all spoke English or if we all spoke French, if we all dressed the same way, and if we did not have all this confusion?"

On the surface that argument might appear to make some sense. However, assimilation is just impossible to achieve. Even if we all wanted to do the same things and adopt the melting-pot approach like our neighbours to the south, who after two centuries have discovered it does not work, we would also come to the same conclusion.

If we take a look at the 5,000 years of written history we find that the peoples who were making history 5,000 years ago are still here today. The Egyptians, the Syrians, the Philistines, the Jews, the people that inhabited the lands of Mesopotamia, have still retained their individuality and cultural characteristics. Maybe their cultures have changed a little, but each one is still different from the others. Consider the wars that have taken place between these peoples, the atrocities that they have inflicted on one another. They survived Alexander the Great; they survived the Persian Empire, and they survived the crusades. There have been dictators of the left and dictators of the right who have tried to build a homogeneous society of the people under them but they did not succeed. Why not? They did not succeed, honourable senators, because it goes against the grain of nature. We are what we are and we have to accept each other for what we are. We cannot change anything even if we wanted to. Assimilation can only take place through intermarriage, but intermarriage does not happen that frequently, consequently people retain their characteristics. And what is wrong with accepting each other for what we are?

Look at world history. It is strewn with examples of intolerance; people and countries have fought one another because of their differences. Going back to people who take a simplistic view of society, they say that we should speak one language because it is too costly to speak more than one. Let me tell you, honourable senators, that countries of the world have invested not only their capital but also the cream of their youth to fight each other for their differences, and even that did not assimilate people.

The problems we had 4,000 or 5,000 years ago are still with us today. Let us just take a cursory look at the map today. What do we see? Look at Northern Ireland, look at Cyprus, look at Lebanon, look at the Middle East, look at South Africa, look at Pakistan and Bangladesh and India. All over the world there are people who are still fighting for the same reasons they were fighting each other at the time when man lived in caves. What have we in Canada done? We have adopted a policy of multiculturalism which, I believe, is the most civilized and the most mature approach to coexistence. It is the most advanced way in which people can live together.

There is another point I wish to raise, honourable senators. Some of our confrères from the Province of Quebec seem to misunderstand the intent and scope of multiculturalism. Multiculturalism is not in conflict with the official languages; it complements them. We are not trying to make the languages of the other minority groups the official languages of Canada. It is an accepted fact that English and French are the official languages of this country. We recognize that the people who live in the province of Quebec are the leaders in cultural identity. If it were not for the people of the province of Quebec we would not have a policy of multiculturalism today. We would not have the kind of society we have today. We are going to do all we can to help them achieve their just aspirations.

I get the impression that some people criticize the Senate as an institution. We are respected as individuals, and there is a degree of prestige that goes with our position, but as an institution we are criticized. I cannot understand why this is so, because in the few weeks that I have been here I have witnessed a great deal of talent and I have heard penetrating debates. Perhaps what is wrong with the Senate is that we are not public-relations conscious. We are not letting the people of Canada know what is happening here. And I think, perhaps a little presumptuously because I am the most junior senator in this chamber, that the Senate should, in addition to its existing responsibilities, adopt multiculturalism as a means to promote national unity. We should take this concept, this ideology, and try to make Canadians more aware of it. Canadians should know the purpose and the intent of the policy of multiculturalism because, I believe, that multiculturalism has given Canadians that common denominator which enables all of us to stand up and say, "Je suis canadien;" "Sono Canadese;" "I am Canadian."

On motion of Senator Cottreau, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, May 30, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, May 30, 1977

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Hon. Maurice Bourget, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.
Prayers.

CLERK'S ACCOUNTS

STATEMENT TABLED PURSUANT TO RULE 112

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that, in accordance with rule 112, the Clerk of the Senate had laid on the Table a detailed statement of his receipts and disbursements for the fiscal year 1976-77.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Langlois moved:

That the Clerk's accounts be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Report of the National Energy Board entitled "Canadian Oil—Supply and Requirements," dated February 1977.

Report of The Fisheries Research Board of Canada for the year ended December 31, 1976, pursuant to section 12 of the Fisheries Research Board Act, Chapter F-24, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of document entitled "Agenda for Co-operation," a Discussion Paper on Decontrol and Post-control Issues, issued by the Minister of Finance.

ENERGY

ACQUISITION OF OIL SUPPLIES FROM MEXICO—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have the answer to a question posed by the Honourable Senator Austin on April 28 last. The question was:

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning a visit to Mexico by the Secretary of External Affairs, the Honourable Don Jamieson. Press reports indicate that Mr. Jamieson is engaged in negotiating the acquisition of oil supplies from new Mexican production. Could the government leader tell us whether this is, in fact, the case, and, if so, (a) what quantity of oil will be imported into Canada from Mexico; (b) what will be the role of private companies in acquiring this oil, as they are the only refiners in this country; and (c) will Petro-Canada have a role in this matter?

The answer is: The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Donald Jamieson, did not "negotiate the acquisition of oil supplies from new Mexican production" during his recent state visit to Mexico. The possibility of oil exports to Canada was discussed only in broad terms during the minister's talks with Mexican officials. At the same time that the minister was in Mexico the President of Petro-Canada, Mr. William Hopper, visited Mexico and had private talks with officials of the Mexican national oil company. However, there have been no indications to date that any Canadian company has contracted to import crude oil from Mexico on a regular basis.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

CROWN CORPORATIONS NOT SUBJECT TO AUDIT—
SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: The Honourable Senator Grosart, supported by the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester), on May 18 last posed a question regarding crown corporations not subject to audit by the Auditor General. The question inquired why the constituent acts of the six corporations permitted the appointment of auditors other than the Auditor General, rather than appointment being made under the Financial Administration Act.

In actual fact the constituent acts of many crown corporations do prescribe that the Auditor General will be the auditor, while others permit the appointment of auditors from the private sector. Appointment from the private sector enables the rotation of the audit. In one instance, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is required to have two auditors and the act provides for their terms to overlap. More recent practice is to call for a five-year term for the auditor, with the first year to overlap with the outgoing auditor and the last year to overlap with the incoming auditor. Very recent legislation included this requirement for Petro-Canada and the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation.

While Senator Grosart's question implies that where an auditor is appointed under the Financial Administration Act that auditor is automatically the Auditor General, this may not be the case at all. Section 67 envisages the Auditor General as the alternative, or second choice, to an auditor from the private sector, or as a joint auditor with such an auditor, and reads as follows:

67. (1) Where, in respect of a Crown corporation,
(a) no provision is made in any Act for the appointment of an auditor to audit the accounts and financial transactions of the corporation, or

(b) the auditor is to be appointed pursuant to the Canada Corporations Act or the Canada Business Corporations Act, the Governor in Council shall designate a person to audit the accounts and financial transactions of the corporation.

(2) Notwithstanding any other Act, the Auditor General is eligible to be appointed the auditor, or a joint auditor, of a Crown corporation.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government if I heard him say that my question had an implication. I do not think it did. Would the leader not agree that my question was merely related to those crown corporations whose books were not subject to audit by the Auditor General?

The government leader has given his reply. He has provided the names of the six corporations which are currently not subject to audit by the Auditor General, although I understand now that there is legislation pending in the form of Bill C-20 which will at least give the Auditor General access to the information contained in those books, if not the right to audit. But the Leader of the Government has indicated an implication in my question that I do not think was there.

Senator Perrault: If there is any further clarification required, I would be pleased to make further inquiries. The information is as complete as has been made available to me to this time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SALARY OF FORMER EMPLOYEE—REQUEST FOR FURTHER ANSWER

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, some weeks ago a question was asked of the Leader of the Government as to the salaries paid to former members of the CBC, or Radio-Canada, have it as you wish. One person in particular is now a member of the Parti Québécois cabinet. The answer given by the government leader was to the effect that Radio-Canada, or the CBC, felt that, basically, it was none of our business.

Having been trained in the law—rather feebly perhaps, having none of the laudatory titles that some honourable senators have; nonetheless, having studied at McGill under some of the country's greatest constitutional law professors, I decided to not only research this question myself but to seek their advice, and the collectivity of this effort leads me to question the partisan attitude of certain senators in this house to which I cannot subscribe—

Senator Grosart: Question!

Senator Ewasew: I am interrupted. Someone shouts "Question!" Well, question or no question, I did some research and I asked myself whether or not we, as the Senate, were not somewhat made fools of by the CBC reply. Is not the Senate, regardless of who asked the question, entitled to the answer to any question put during the Question Period as a matter of law, delicate though it might be to the government, especially when put by a senator appointed by the reigning government?

I ask the government leader, very frankly and very firmly—and, hopefully, not too aggressively—that the answer be insisted upon and provided just as soon as possible. Furthermore, I reiterate that the position that I just adopted has nothing to do with partisan politics, but with what I believe to be the prerogatives of this body, the Senate collectively, and its members whatever their political beliefs individually.

Senator Norrie: Honourable senators, I concur 100 per cent with what the honourable senator has said.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators may avail themselves of the opportunity, at periodic intervals, of having officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation appear before the appropriate committee of the Senate. I suggest that honourable senators avail themselves of the opportunity for cross-examination on such matters at that time. Certainly, I can convey to the appropriate authorities the dissatisfaction on the part of certain senators with the reply to the question posed about the former CBC entertainer who is now an active member of a political party in the province of Quebec.

● (2020)

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, may I just put this supplementary question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate? This is not just a matter of questions being asked by individual senators. It somehow strikes at the prerogatives of this house. I think, Radio-Canada or the CBC notwithstanding, a question like that, as innocently and as frankly as it was asked, obliges a reply, but the reply which the leader unfortunately had to give this house—and I am not blaming him personally—is totally and wholly unsatisfactory. I am sorry.

RAILWAY ACT

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 19, the debate on the motion of Senator Bosa for the second reading of Bill C-207, to amend the Railway Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as mentioned by the sponsor in his brief yet comprehensive explanation, Bill C-207 is an amendment to the Railway Act which would require a railway to give 30 days' notice of its intention to expand or change an existing line if such line is located within 1,000 feet of a residential, commercial or public building. The purpose of the 30 days' notice is to give interested persons an opportunity to make representations about the proposed change to the Canadian Transport Commission, and the commission could then require the railway to submit formal and detailed plans and, indeed, to hold public hearings if it thought it desirable to do so.

As was also mentioned by the sponsor, this is a non-controversial bill which was approved by all parties in the House of Commons. Indeed, it is strange that up to now public notice was not required to be given by a railway unless it was intending to construct a branch line.

Since this bill concerns only subsection (4) of section 119 of the Railway Act, I was interested in seeing, first, what section 119 deals with. As we do not see many amendments to this statute I will read subsection (1), which is the operative part of section 119. It reads as follows:

If any deviation, change or alteration is required by the company to be made in the railway, or any portion thereof, as already constructed, or as merely located and sanctioned, a plan, profile and book of reference of the portion of such railway proposed to be changed, showing the deviation, change or alteration proposed to be made, shall, in like manner as hereinbefore provided with respect to the original plan, profile and book of reference, be submitted for the approval of the Commission, and may be sanctioned by the Commission.

It is easy to see that it could be a time-consuming and expensive proposition for the railway to make such a plan, profile and book of reference. These are documents which require time and expert knowledge in order to be made and assembled. Consequently, subsection (4), which is amended by this bill, provided that the commission could dispense with such requirements in certain cases. So, since public notice was not required considerable alterations could be made, or at least commenced, by the railway before the public was aware such changes were contemplated. And such changes could have a very poor effect upon persons living in the vicinity.

It is interesting to note that the wording, though not the substance, of the bill was changed when it was considered by the Transport and Communications Committee of the House of Commons. The original bill, introduced on October 22, 1976, added to subsection (4) the words "or if such deviation, change or alteration does not in any way decrease the use or enjoyment that residents in the immediate vicinity of the railway may make or have of their residences." This wording was so vague and imprecise that it would be practically impossible to give it a judicial interpretation. The added subsection (4.1) then dealt with notice.

The amended bill clarifies the matter. It retains subsection (4) as it is in the present act, but it changes subsection (4.1) and adds subsection (4.2). It drops the wording "or if such deviation, change or alteration does not in any way decrease the use of enjoyment that residents in the immediate vicinity of the railway may make or have of their residences." Subsection (4.1) compels a railway to give public notice of a proposed change if a residential, commercial or public building is within 1,000 feet of the proposed change. Subsection (4.2) deals with the notice, and also authorizes the commission to dispense with or to shorten the time for such notice to be given if it deems it proper to do so. The bill as amended is an improvement over the original. It is worthy of support, and I do support it. Since its effect is clear I do not believe any useful purpose would be served in sending it to a committee for further study.

Honourable senators, since we are dealing with an amendment to the Railway Act, may I digress for a moment to mention another railway matter?

On Thursday last the government leader tabled a document entitled "Atlantic Provinces Transportation Program." I expect legislation concerning this will be introduced in due course so that there will be opportunity for full debate. It is an incredible document. Apparently, the Atlantic premiers agreed with the Minister of Transport at a meeting on February 27 last that the railway passenger service in the Atlantic region should be reduced to one daily train from Halifax to Montreal.

Personally, I find it incomprehensible that the Government of Nova Scotia would agree to eliminate rail passenger service between Sydney and Halifax. To my mind, that shows a shocking disregard for the interests of the people of Cape Breton—a disregard which is reprehensible in the extreme and impossible to understand. Moreover, the document calmly assumes that the hearings of the CTC on rail passenger service will recommend the elimination of all but one passenger train. Since the agreement was reached in February and the hearings by the Canadian Transport Commission commenced on May 17, one can only conclude that these hearings are nothing but window dressing, a publicity stunt, which can only lead to a complete lack of confidence in the CTC.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your indulgence. I will speak on this matter at greater length and condemn it more vigorously when the legislation comes before us.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Petten moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL UNITY

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 26, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault, calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Ernest G. Cottreau: Honourable senators, first I would like to commend the government Senate leader for raising on May 17, 1977, the inquiry on the issue of national unity, in terms that lend themselves beautifully to this day's discussion, offering at the same time a range of alternate choices of interest to the various regions in Canada. It presents the opportunity, and I quote:

Of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

I also commend the honourable senators who have already taken part in this debate.

It is therefore from that point of view, perhaps a little too regional in aspect, that I propose to make a few remarks.

In my capacity as a Canadian of French origin, born in the province of Nova Scotia which in 1604 was host to the first French settlers in Canada, and more especially as a representative in this house of some 80,000 people of Nova Scotia that are recognized throughout the world as "Acadians", I feel I have a duty to state how Nova Scotia Acadians feel toward problems that are now menacing this country's unity, after the Parti Québécois was elected in Quebec on November 15 last.

[English]

Honourable senators, although the main thrust of my remarks will bear on the Acadians of Nova Scotia, I am in no way oblivious of the fact that there are equally important and even more important French-speaking minorities in the other provinces of Canada. Nor do I want in any way to slight the feelings of the other ethnic groups, all of whom, in my estimation, contribute substantially to the richness of the Canadian mosaic.

In Nova Scotia the distribution of the Acadian population is not uniform and therefore it is difficult to obtain a consensus of opinion from them. There are three main areas in which we find concentrations of Acadians. One is in the southwestern part of the province and the two others are in the Cape Breton and Antigonish areas. The Acadian, by nature, is an industrious and adept worker and will usually seek employment wherever it is available. For that reason, many are scattered throughout the province. For instance, in Halifax there are nearly 22,000 Acadians. I usually make it my business to contact as many of them as I can, and it is my opinion that, by and large, they view the current unrest in Canada in terms of the relationship between French and English with grave apprehension. There is no doubt that the threatened separation of the province of Quebec from the rest of Canada looms as a disquieting black cloud on the horizon, and one which they do not want. Like all other Nova Scotians, with whom they now blend so well, they sense a weakening of the economic climate in the province should there ever be a breakdown of Confederation, and they also foresee another disaster for them as far as their cultural and linguistic rights are concerned. Therefore, first and foremost, they want a united Canada, and they will categorically oppose any movement within Canada designed to weaken its unity.

However, I would be less than truthful if I were to insinuate in any manner that the Acadians of Nova Scotia are completely devoid of sympathy for those in Quebec who strive to protect their own cultural and linguistic rights. Having themselves experienced the erosion of their culture over the years, they recognize the need and the wisdom of the French majority in Quebec establishing now sound basic principles which will safeguard their culture in the years ahead.

[Translation]

After all, it is a well-known fact that French-speaking minorities have suffered throughout the years because of the assimilation of their culture. The last census indicates, for instance, that there are 80,222 Acadians in Nova Scotia. Of these, only 39,335 put down French as their mother tongue, which means that 40,887 Acadians have become anglicized. The Fédération des Francophones hors Québec, of which the Acadian Federation of Nova Scotia is a member, has just published a report entitled "The Heirs of Lord Durham" which foresees that within the next 25 years 71 per cent of French-speaking people outside Quebec will be anglicized. According to this report which, as a matter of fact, draws a gloomy but true picture of the situation of French Canadians outside Quebec in the nine Canadian provinces where French is the language of minorities, there are 1,417,265 Francophones who are Canadian born. Of these, only 924,790 claim French as their mother tongue. According to these same statistical data which have been drawn from the 1971 census, one out of every four Francophones who indicated French as their mother tongue is no longer using this language; therefore, only 675,210 Francophones outside Quebec are still using French in their daily life.

This report, which is certainly the best documented work on the French-speaking minorities in Canada since the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, sounds the alarm and warns us that the time has come for us to act if we want to preserve what remains of our culture. I consider therefore as quite natural that Acadians should feel very strongly about the decline of the French culture in Canada and be ready to do the utmost to contribute to its renewal, both in Quebec and outside Quebec.

[English]

On the other hand, being staunch supporters of the concept of Canadian unity, they do not associate the need in Quebec for the preservation of cultural and linguistic rights with the need for separation from Canada. They hope, as do the majority of Canadians, that the malaise currently rampant in Quebec will be resolved to the satisfaction of all concerned, and within the framework of the Canadian Confederation.

As to the aspirations of my area, they are purely and simply tied to the development of the area as a whole. There is no desire on the part of Acadians to be treated as an isolated group in terms of regional development, nor is there any way to do so. The fabric of the society in southwestern Nova Scotia is closely knit and is made up of the various racial elements found in the area. The word "assimilation" has become of late a household word, but that is not to say that it is something that all Acadians seek to avoid.

Due to the fact that English is the dominant language and that Acadians are bilingual, linguistic difficulties are all but eliminated in the conduct of business everywhere in the community—in the fields of finance; of government, both provincial and municipal; of communications; and in practically all socioeconomic activities. This is a situation which necessarily confronts any ethnic minority which fate has placed within the confines of an English majority. However, there are rewarding merits in that both communities can work together. As a matter of fact, one of the serious factors which complicates the trend towards so-called assimilation is that of intermarriage between the French and the English. It is quite obvious, from the rate at which these marriages are now taking place, that the relationship is good, and it can be said that in the majority of cases the parties to these mixed marriages are partial to the French culture.

At the same time, unless there is a vibrant economic life in the area, people will migrate elsewhere and their departure will have adverse effects on both cultures.

As I was looking for material to compile these few notes, I came across two reports. The first I have already mentioned, and quoted from a cultural standpoint; the second is a 200-page report which was received jointly by the Nova Scotia Department of Development and the Nova Scotia Department of Municipal Affairs, with the object of preparing an economic base study of the southwestern region of Nova Scotia and identifying economic development opportunities for the region.

I am very pleased with this last-mentioned report because it states very realistically the potential of the area. This part of the province, because of its geographic location, is unlikely to attract big corporations and, therefore, it has only one choice, which is to recognize that its industrial development is for the most part tied to the available natural resource bases which are the sea and the forest. The full development of these resources holds the key to the continuing good living standards which the people of this area now enjoy.

Therefore, within the region we aspire to a good employment climate so that the ranks to our population will not be further depleted. We would like to keep more of our young people in the region. We hope that the English-speaking population will continue to appreciate the Acadian culture.

The basis of the local economy is the fishing industry. I believe the Minister of Fisheries is fully aware of the importance of this natural resource, and that he wants to conserve it. I would hope that the fishermen will continue to receive the cooperation of government in their efforts to keep up to date with the latest techniques in fish processing and marketing. In line with a good research program, I believe the government should locate a fisheries school in the area.

I said earlier that due to its geographic location the southwestern area of Nova Scotia is not likely to draw big outside industry, yet, by virtue of its being within easy reach of the New England states, it is an ideal terminal for ferry services between Yarmouth and Bar Harbour, Maine, and Portland, Maine. At present, there are two such ferries. One, the M.V. Bluenose, is operated by the CNR, and the other, the Caribe, by a private company. It is of the utmost importance that these services be maintained. In the first place, they offer a means to the fishing industry of carrying its fish directly and rapidly to market and, secondly, it brings into Nova Scotia an influx of tourists which are a great boost to local trade. The M.V. Bluenose needs to be replaced. It is our hope that the government will keep its word, and provide this replacement.

We hope to be able to maintain better schools, where the French language can be effectively taught in a manner which will enhance its present low standard. In a further attempt to combat the watering down of our language and culture, we desperately want to convey to the three levels of government our need to keep our bilingual college, le College Sainte-Anne, whose services ought not to be measured in dollars and cents but rather on the value of its contribution to the cultural life of the community.

I will serve no useful purpose in further expanding the list of our aspirations, honourable senators, because I know I have exhausted your patience. I shall therefore terminate my remarks with this thought: We should always bear in mind that, regardless of race, colour, religion or language, men and women all over the world were meant to work together in order to make the world a better place in which to live. It seems to me that our most pressing need in Canada today is tolerance. Narrow, bigoted nationalism, indeed bigotry of any kind, should find no place in the context of Canadian society.

On motion of Senator Austin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, May 31, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., Hon. Maurice Bourget, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Orders of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, respecting certain compensation plans, as follows:

1. National Grocers Co. Ltd. and the group of its employees engaged in Cash and Carry operations in Timmins, Ontario and from the date of certification, namely, 9 February 1976, represented by the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, Local 429. Order dated May 27, 1977.

2. Ozite Corporation of Canada Ltd. and the group of its employees represented by Le Syndicat des Salariés de Ozite, St-Jean, Québec. Order dated May 27, 1977.

CLERESTORY OF THE SENATE CHAMBER

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I would remind the members of the Special Committee on the Clerestory of the Senate Chamber that the committee will meet when the Senate rises today.

RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Bosa moved third reading of Bill C-207, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SOLAR ENERGY APPLICATION BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, for the second reading of the Bill C-309, intituled: "An Act respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy", and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that the Bill be not now read the second time but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for consideration and report.—(Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C.).

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I understand that we are awaiting a ruling by the Chair, so until this is made I think this matter should stand.

Order stands.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING—DEBATE

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 26, the debate on the motion of Senator Frith for second reading of Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2).

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, this is the second bill we have had in this session to amend the Customs Tariff, and for that reason it is designated as Customs Tariff (No. 2). We have these bills from time to time, and what we find on examining them is that they increase and decrease tariffs, raising the eternal question of what Canada's policy should be on protection versus free trade.

● (1410)

It is an argument that has been going on for a long time. Some of us will remember one very distinguished senator, once here, Senator Roebuck, who took the position that the only answer to Canada's problem was complete free trade. We give lip service as a country; the government gives lip service to the principle of multinational free trade. We say: "This is our target, but we do not really believe it," and for good reasons, because every time there is a question of increasing or decreasing tariffs, it raises questions and problems that affect the whole community. Every increase or decrease in tariffs will in some measure affect consumer prices and jobs. There is always the problem when tariffs are increased to protect an industry: "Which industry should we select to protect?" Almost invariably there is a penalty against other industries.

Consumer interest, of course, is always present and we find immediately when we look at this bill that one of its first provisions deals with measures taken a few years ago, in 1973, to give some relief to the problem of inflation in Canada and, particularly, consumer prices.

The question that one should ask and to which we should receive an answer is, of course: have these measures done what they are intended to do? One of the things that has always surprised me when these bills are before us, before the other place or in committee, is that we never seem to get any kind of indication, any kind of cost-benefit assessment, either when the bill is before us or later on, as to whether it did what it was intended to do. One has to presume, of course, that within the department these considerations have been taken into account and that someone, somewhere knows what the effect of a reduction or an increase in the tariff would be and, sooner or later, at some time along the road, assesses the result in relation to the target. However, I see no evidence of this on a continuing basis. Once in a while a question is asked with respect to a specific item and an answer may be given. In my opinion it is something that our committee or, perhaps, a committee especially charged with a mandate to look into this whole question, should consider.

The bill before us, for example, is in three main sections, as indicated by the sponsor. It deals, first of all, with those anti-inflation measures of which I spoke; secondly, with some special concessions to third world countries and, finally, some miscellaneous changes, mainly relating to machinery, equipment and scientific apparatus. The specific purpose of the reductions that were made following the budget speech in February of 1973 was to lower prices. For this reason there was a general reduction of tariff items, some in the food area, some in other areas affecting trade, now of the magnitude of $1.4 billion. Of this amount, food items account for $400 million and the others for $1 billion.

This was a temporary measure and one which has been extended from time to time. One of the purposes of the bill before us is to extend some of those reductions for another year, to June 30, 1978. There are, however, exceptions. In this area, too, the old story is repeated—we reduce some tariffs and increase others. Exceptions are made to the reductions that were put into effect in 1973, and subsequently. Items such as lighting fixtures now go back to the rates in effect prior to the temporary reductions being brought in. There will be an actual increase in the tariff on refined sugar, amounting to one-fifth of a cent. That increase is intended to net-out the position of the sugar refining industry in Canada, although even with that increase the tariff will still remain below the level of 1973.

There are special reductions added for certain tropical products. This, again, deals with the second group, which consists of concessions to developing countries. These are what are known as items in the tropical products group.

Honourable senators will be aware that there has been considerable discussion at the international level as to the type of help that developed countries can give immediately to Third World countries, and one of the concessions taken was that countries such as Canada could move in this direction immediately.

This, of course, causes some problems. We are now entering the final stages of the GATT renegotiations, the so-called Tokyo Round, and our negotiators and the government itself find themselves in a bit of a dilemma. There are definite concessions all across the board which we are prepared to make, but the minister and those negotiating wish to hold those as bargaining items. In spite of that general policy of holding back on those concessions for purposes of bargaining in Tokyo, the decision has been taken to go ahead immediately and give special concessions to Third World countries, not only in respect of tropical products and food but across the board. So, we are adding some items to the general preferential tariff, the tariff concessions extended by developed countries to Third World countries only. That measure will affect $100 million in imports.

The general preferential tariff has been somewhat controversial in our foreign affairs history. At one time we flatly refused to extend it, even when other nations were doing so. We had a reason for taking that position. We attempted to argue that position with other countries, but it was not accepted, as a result of which the government decided to join those other developed countries in extending general tariff concessions to Third World countries. This bill, if passed, will add a number of products to the general preferential tariff rate; at the same time, we will remove the MFN tariff, the most-favoured-nation tariff, on a number of products. Those are two means of achieving the same result.

Finally, there is a group of miscellaneous tariff changes. Here again, we have pluses and minuses, increases and decreases. The major item is perhaps in the area of the importation of machinery and equipment. Honourable senators will recall that when the United Kingdom entered the European Common Market, it automatically lost the British preferential tariff. At that time the decision was made not to cancel the entire British preferential tariff immediately, but to let it continue and see what developed. It was again the intention, I believe expressed, to hold that as a bargaining item with the U.K.

The present bill would remove some nine categories of machinery and equipment from the British preferential tariff, which is 2½ per cent, and bring it under the most-favoured-nation tariff, which is 15 per cent. This is the kind of item that again raises the whole question: Whom are you protecting? Obviously if it is easier financially and commercially to bring in this machinery, it means that possibly some Canadian firms which might be in more or less the same business areas will find themselves at a disadvantage. However, if this is of "a class or kind"—to recall a famous phrase that Senator Hayden will remember—if this machinery is of a class or kind made in Canada, then a rebate is available to those who may be affected. I often wonder why this is necessary. Why could there not be a positive rather than a negative correction of any disadvantages? But that is the way it has been done for years.

There are some relieving clauses; that is, relieving certain items from duty, such as cameras which are for use in the film industry. Here is a clear case where it has been decided that it would be to the advantage of a Canadian industry to reduce import duties. This does not very often happen, and there are some in business who think it should happen more often. The problem here, of course, is our cost of production. Any consideration of tariffs raises not only the question of their effect on prices and jobs directly in Canada, but also on the viability of our own exports and export markets. What has been discovered over and over again is that if we have to import items necessary for the manufacturing or processing of goods here, if we have to use imported components, then this becomes a special factor. Our problem all along the line in the export market, which is so important to Canada, is that at the moment for various reasons we are becoming less and less competitive rather than more so. Evidence heard in our committees this year indicates that this is probably the most serious problem affecting Canada; that is, costs in the domestic market in Canada. Manufacturing prices are rising faster in Canada than in any other OECD country. This is an essential problem, and it is very closely connected with our tariff policy because, of course, we seek easier access to other markets; that is to say, we seek lower tariffs around the world and yet we raise our tariffs as we are doing in this case. In specific cases we were subject to retaliation, and we have had numerous cases of retaliation already. We have special names for the various kinds of retaliation, such as countervailing duties, and so on. One has to assume that all these have been taken into very careful consideration in the bill before us.

When the sponsor of the bill is making his reply, I would be interested in hearing what other countries are doing with regard to concessions to Third World countries following the international negotiations. Has there been general agreement that there will be specific concessions made by each of the countries who were party to those negotiations? It has been said many times that we in Canada tend to be a bit "patsy" in this field; that we tend to take a high moralistic stand, and an unrealistic stand, in terms of the action on the very same items which other countries are taking. We had clear evidence of that only the other day in one of our committees.

The field of agriculture is a good example of the kind of situation we face in the tariff field. I must say I was amazed by evidence we were given recently that we are importing more and more of certain basic food items than we did a few years ago. There is a tremendous demand from the agricultural community now for tariff protection. The disposition is apparently not to grant that protection. I am not sufficiently expert in the whole field to say whether that decision is good or bad, but the facts are that over the last ten years, for example, the import of apples into Canada has increased from 54 million pounds to 148 million pounds; of onions, from 63 million pounds to 96 million pounds; of tomatoes, by 48 million pounds; of broccoli, from nine million pounds to 34 million pounds; of strawberries, from 15 million pounds to 55 million pounds. Generally, those figures are over a period of ten years.

What does this mean? Well, of course, it is partly as a result of our so-called "affluent society." Canadians, to some extent, are not prepared to wait for Canadian produce. They want the early, early market items. But that does not totally account for these figures. It seems to me that there must be something wrong somewhere when a country such as Canada, which has more farm land per capita than any other country in the world, finds itself in the position of steadily increasing its importation of food from other countries. All of the items I referred to are imported from the United States.

I should mention on that with respect to the general area of machinery and equipment the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce played a significant role. Honourable senators will recall that when we were discussing an earlier bill, it was discovered in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee—and closely followed up—that a situation had developed in which the intent of the government had apparently not come through in the legislation. The Supreme Court handed down a decision which had the effect of creating a result other than that which had been intended by the government in its legislation. That matter was discussed in full in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and the committee thereafter suggested a solution. It obtained from the minister an undertaking that the necessary steps would be taken immediately. Those steps were taken under the Financial Administration Act by order in council and the matter was corrected. We now have in this bill the follow-up of that undertaking to our committee, where the correction is now legislative rather than by order in council.

● (1430)

I draw your attention to this because I am one who has commented a number of times on what I have called the Hayden formula for amending legislation. My view has always been that I would much prefer the amendment be a Senate amendment. Knowing that this has not always been possible, it is fair to pay a compliment to this new formula, which achieves the same result in the long run but not always with the same credit to the Senate as would be achieved if the amendment went back to the House of Commons from the Senate.

Honourable senators, I have no very strong views as to whether or not it is necessary for this bill to go to committee. I have raised a few matters, but it seems to me that they are beyond the normal discussion and examination of a bill. I will leave it to the sponsor of the bill and to other honourable senators to suggest whether or not it should go to committee.

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, may I be permitted a question? As the deputy leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition in this house is leading in this matter, I assume—and I believe properly—that he is speaking for his party. I listened as carefully as I could to his speech, but I am not clear as to whether his party still advocates its traditional policy of protection—the old national policy on which the Conservative Party was founded—largely for the industries of central Canada? Is this still Conservative Party policy?

The Deputy Leader of the Opposition went so far as to speak of absolute free trade. Has the Conservative Party policy now gone to the opposite extreme, and is for absolute free trade? Where does the Conservative Party philosophy stand at the present time on this question of protection?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I should say at once that I was not speaking for the Conservative opposition. I had not consulted anyone on this matter, and it would be presumptuous of me to say that in my attitude toward the bill I was speaking for the Conservative Party. No one is more aware than Senator Greene that when one speaks from this side of the house or from the other side he is not necessarily enunciating party policy.

On the broader matter of protection versus free trade, which is the phrase that has been used over the years, I can only say that so far as I know—and I am not stating Conservative policy—we are in exactly the same position as the Liberal Party, in that we examine every single proposal for an increase or decrease in tariff and ask, "What will it do to the economy; what will it do to prices; what will it do to jobs; what will it do to this region or that region?"

We are even starting to go a little further and consulting the provinces—perhaps not far enough at the moment, but the matter now goes beyond federal jurisdiction because we have what are called non-tariff barriers set up by provinces. Liquor listings and prices are a good example, and there are many others.

The position of my party, so far as I know, is that we will examine every single proposal. I do not know of anyone in Canada today who, in his right senses, would be for immediate free trade, or for an immediate increase in the total tariff wall.

Senator Greene: Then, I take it, from the answer of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, that the Conservative Party is now following Liberal Party philosophy on this question of protection versus free trade?

Senator Grosart: In reply to the honourable senator, I would put it the other way around, because the fact of the matter is that, as I recall my history, the Conservative Party was originally dedicated to the new national policy of 1874, I think, upon which our present economy is founded. But the Conservative Party moved away from that gradually after about 1912. The Conservative policy from then on, as I recall, was never one of 100 per cent protection. It was the kind of saw-off that was made, say, in the famous Imperial preferences, which were not complete but, rather, partial protection. That is a good example because in 1933, I think, we had what were then called the Imperial tariffs—later the Commonwealth tariff structure—which went both ways. It was both protective and free trade. It meant freer trade to one part of the world; protection against another.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the analysis of this bill that Senator Grosart made was entirely consistent with the instructions and briefing I had received. He suggested that perhaps it is not necessary for the bill to go to committee, but it seems to me that he raised three questions which, while not necessarily controversial, are questions that I would like to have answered, and perhaps the committee is the best place for that.

The first of these is whether or not the other nations who gave undertakings at Geneva were as swift in implementing those undertakings as Canada had been. That is information I do not have, but it is information that I am sure the Senate would like to have, and we can get it by directing the attention of the officials concerned to Senator Grosart's remarks.

The second question concerned the matter of the increase in agricultural imports. My inclination would be to follow the hypothesis that Senator Grosart gave, namely, that it might very well be explained by the seasonal need to take advantage of earlier crops in broccoli and the other items of produce that Canada cannot produce in quite the same quantities in those seasons. However, it might well be that there is another explanation, and the question he raised seems serious enough to require one.

The third point that Senator Grosart made was with reference to the Senate undertaking. He said, as I understood it, that the legislation resulting from the Supreme Court case was an over-correction, and was more severe than the department and government really intended. The Senate committee pointed out, and the government agreed that the Senate committee was correct, that it was an over-correction. Therefore, it has now been adjusted to the point where it should be in this bill.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I shall be moving that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL UNITY

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault, calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, the Senate has not been engaged for some time in an activity more valuable to our Canadian family than this debate, the purpose of which is to promote among Canadians a better understanding and appreciation of the nature and character of our national unity.

We are at a time in the life of our community, now nearly 110 years old, when a good many of its members are questioning the fundamental concepts on which this nation has been constructed. Quite a number of Canadians are asking: What has been achieved for us in Canada? Who has benefited more and who less from the way our Canadian Confederation was established and has evolved? What are our outstanding domestic problems, and how truly serious are they for the well-being of us all? How shall we best evaluate and accommodate the real and even the merely apprehended grievances which exist in our Canadian community?

When this debate was launched by the government leader, none of us in this chamber were so naive as to believe that the Senate press gallery would be filled and would report our every word, or that the country would wait with breath suspended. But if we believe at all in the validity of why we are here as senators, then from that belief springs a clear duty to employ our knowledge of this country, our experience in its public affairs, and our judgment as to its well-being in a way which can inform and influence its citizens about the state and importance of its unity. We need to address ourselves to this contemplative and introspective period in Canadian affairs in a way that will not allow Canadians to lose sight of the magnificent success story which Canada has been in the community of nations, and the truly great future which Canada holds for all of its family from coast to coast. Canada, in the eyes of the world, is a country of unparalleled economic prosperity and an unparalleled economic future. Canada, in the eyes of the world, is a country of unparalleled personal and political freedoms, and, in our democratic political process, I am sure that we will continue to guarantee those freedoms.

In preparing my thoughts for this debate, I have had the guidance of my colleagues who preceded me in this debate. I believe that the contribution in thought and understanding is a substantial one. In particular, I offer my congratulations to three of our colleagues who spoke for the first time as senators in this debate. I refer to Senator Steuart, Senator Frith and Senator Bosa. Clearly, each brings to this chamber a wealth of experience in understanding and dealing with the problems of our country, and a great talent to apply to the future moulding of our national well-being. They will make an undoubted contribution here to public affairs, and I look forward to working with each of them.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: In launching this debate, Senator Perrault made it clear that what the government had in mind was to ask members of this house—who, after all, represent all the regions of Canada and, in total, most walks of life and experience in our community, whether it be law, medicine, business, labour, native affairs, and so on—to express their views and feelings about Canada so that parliamentarians in the other place, the media and others in particular who are following these events closely, can have access to an examination of these issues and to a body of information and opinion of Canadian affairs. For one, I am aware that there is much interest among the community, generally, and the media in particular, in what we say here, and I am told that the best of our thoughts may well appear in an article to be written on the Senate and on this debate. I believe that the government is considering the establishment of a parliamentary committee on national unity to hear the views of Canadians directly, and our work here may well influence the shape and nature of the government's decision.

Accordingly, I urge all of our colleagues who can possibly do so to participate in and contribute to this debate in the Senate on national unity, and to speak out for and on behalf of those aspects of life in Canada which they represent, and which they believe to be most valuable to the continuity of our community. Indeed, if enough senators on both the government and the opposition side do participate, I would like to suggest to the government leader that he consider publishing these debates in a separate document which can then be made widely available in Canada, to schools and community associations everywhere, as a subject of study and discussion.

From the comments which some of our Quebec colleagues have made, I am aware of the sensitivity which they feel toward public comment and debate on national unity as that topic affects events in Quebec. Of course, this debate is concerned with issues relating to Canada which are current everywhere in our nation—issues such as western regionalism and alienation, the economic consequences of Confederation for the maritime provinces, Sir John A. Macdonald's grand national policy, and the centralization of manufacturing and the financial community in the Golden Triangle of Quebec and Ontario. There is also the development of the political identity and nature of the Northwest Territories—on which I shall speak later this afternoon—and many other issues which quickly come to all our minds.

In each part of Canada there is a preoccupation and a concern with some critical question which, in effect, amounts to a sense of grievance against Canada as a whole. For example, Senator Rowe has made it clear to us in times past that Newfoundland has a real sense of grievance concerning the responsibilities of Canada for such matters as transportation within that province, and between that province and the mainland of Canada. Senator Bonnell on many occasions has raised with us the problems affecting Prince Edward Island.

All senators here have spoken about the particular problems and situations in their parts of the country. In Quebec, a party has come to power which seeks not merely to redress grievances and to argue for a better and more equitable arrangement within Confederation but, instead, seeks sovereign independence from Canada. Its leader, René Levesque, has so stated. And that, of course, if achieved, would be the end of this nation as we know it.

I do not believe that the political events of November 15, 1976, and their aftermath, in Quebec are the business only of the Québécois, but I do agree that in the final analysis only the Québécois, and by that I mean all of the people who are resident in the province of Quebec—can determine whether the best chance for their political, social and economic prosperity resides in a partnership with other Canadians, or whether it resides in some other choice. The debate in Quebec, however, is one which also decides the future political, social, and economic affairs of the residents of the province of British Columbia, and for that reason people in my part of Canada believe absolutely that their attitudes and intentions for Canada and for Quebec must be made known in Quebec before the Québécois make any decision about their future. It is not, therefore, to interfere in the debate amongst Quebecers, but to give realism to Quebecers in their internal debate, that the people of my province and of other parts of Canada wish to have their views and attitudes made known.

I well appreciate and understand the fear of Quebecers who favour and fight for Confederation that stupid things will be said by people elsewhere in Canada about Quebec, about French-Canadians and about Canada itself, and that these stupid statements, made, I believe, more out of ignorance than malintent, can be used by the separatists to argue that a state of attitude exists in the rest of Canada which justifies the separation of Quebec from Canada. I know that those in Quebec who defend the continuation of Confederation in a viable form resent silly statements from the rest of Canada that require them to go on the defensive in their debate in Quebec, rather than being able to carry at all times the attack to the separatists. I ask my colleagues from Quebec who support Confederation, as I do, not to be defensive about silly remarks, but to point to the strong feelings of mainstream Canada which seeks, and indeed demands, that Confederation continue as the best answer to the well-being of us all, and as the best system for adjusting the grievances of our nation, as well as distributing in an equitable way its undoubted benefits.

I firmly believe that by letting all of Canada speak to the Quebec question the goodwill and support of all Canadians for the people of Quebec will be apparent. Those who fight for Confederation in Quebec need not fear the real mood in the rest of Canada, and therefore need not be on the defensive in their struggle.

It has to be appreciated also by the people in Quebec that as there are real concerns in that province about Confederation and the way in which it operates, there are also other real concerns, quite different from those which Quebec holds, in other parts of Canada about Confederation and the way in which it operates. When the question is opened in Quebec and the debate accepted, then it cannot be forestalled in terms of the regional grievances in other parts of our country. For my part, I think that is well and good. Once every hundred years is not a bad interval for Canadians to take stock of and assess what they have accomplished, and to study and agree on the tasks which lie ahead. As we are engaged in that task, whether we agree or not, let us take our places and play our roles for the betterment of our country and our people.

I turn to my own province to give some views of people in the mainstream of British Columbia. I wish to give this chamber two examples, out of a profuse number, of the feeling of the people in British Columbia towards Confederation. What I refer to here is representative of the great majority of opinion in my home province. The Vancouver Board of Trade, representing 3,000 business and professional men and women in that community, last week issued a statement of position on national unity, which I would ask this chamber to agree to have appended to the Debates of today. I have copies in both official languages.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of statement see Appendix, p. 786.)

Senator Austin: I select out of this excellent statement three paragraphs:

We believe that, with common purpose, understanding and goodwill, together we can maintain the unity of our country while preserving its two official languages and its many cultures.

We believe that, together, we can achieve the climate and the circumstances which will make it possible for those whose first or only language is French to meet their linguistic, cultural and economic aspirations within a united Canada.

We pledge our understanding of and support for those aspirations.

I congratulate David R. Fraser, President of the Vancouver Board of Trade, and R. J. Rogers, Chairman of the National Unity Committee, for their initiative and clear devotion to public responsibility in preparing and issuing this document.

The second example comes from the brief of the South Cariboo Labour Council of Williams Lake to the British Columbia federal Liberal caucus. The council is a Canadian Labour Congress affiliate, and it met with Senator Perrault, myself and others last Saturday, May 28, in Williams Lake. The men and women of the council did not take advantage of the meeting to complain about wages or working conditions, or any federal expenditures in their town. Instead, a committee headed by Mr. J. W. Lawrence presented a brief on the subject of national unity. Here are their own words, taken from page 3 of their brief:

We as Canadians have a great pride in this country of ours, and the thought of any portion of the country wanting to break away or in fact being allowed to break away is beyond comprehension. We feel that this country of ours has only begun to make its mark on the history of the world and now it is sure no time to have any fringe of population, no matter how large, taking it upon themselves to split up what we consider to be a great nation.

We feel that the government of the land should not allow any area such as Quebec to separate from the rest of the country; and if in the process of negotiating on a new confederation any one area or province is allowed to chip away in the direction that has been suggested by the province of Quebec and by elements in British Columbia and Alberta, then the nation and its future are doomed. We say that a New Confederation must be negotiated, and it must happen soon. But we stress that the nation must remain whole and intact as it is now known.

Honourable senators, that is the voice of real people speaking in positive and realistic support of their country. They must be believed, and their voices made known and appreciated in Quebec and throughout Canada.

Now I want to say a few words about British Columbia, and the worth of this country. When British Columbia joined Confederation on July 20, 1871, The British Colonist of Victoria, a paper still in existence, had this to say:

To-day British Columbia passes peacefully and, let us add, gracefully into the confederated empire of British North America . . . To-day British Columbia and Canada join hands and hearts across the Rocky Mountains . . . let us join hands among ourselves in a friendly but firm resolve to begin our new political life a united and harmonious band for the purpose of making British Columbia—what Nature designed her to be—the Queen Province of the Dominion.

Have no doubt, honourable senators, that British Columbia still feels that way, and I include also the sentiment of a rather general but undoubted feeling of superiority over the rest of Canada.

The debates in British Columbia pro and con Confederation prior to the summer of 1871 were not for idle chatter. Many wanted independence within the British Empire. Many wanted to join the manifest destiny of the United States. But the confederationists won out in the end because, led by one of the most colourful people ever to be in public life, a Nova Scotian by the name of Smith, who changed his name to Amor de Cosmos—"lover of the world"—British Columbians had grasped, not merely an economic proposition, but the essential nature and concept of Canada itself. I have never seen, honourable senators, that concept more beautifully or exactly expressed than by Prime Minister Trudeau when he spoke on national television and radio on November 24, 1976. He said:

Our forefathers willed this country into being. Time, circumstance and pure will cemented us together in a unique national enterprise, and that enterprise, by flying in the face of all expectations, of all experiences, of all conventional wisdom, that enterprise provides the world with a lesson in fraternity.

Honourable senators know that the great experiment of two communities, French and English, and many cultures living together in this Canada is an experiment for the world. It is an example to a world in great turmoil and pain of a country living in harmony and prosperity. It would be a great pity and, in the Prime Minister's sentiments, a great tragedy if that experiment in fraternity were ever allowed to be dissolved.

The session of the British Columbia Legislature begun in February 1870 was given over to the debate on Confederation. The Attorney General, Henry Crease, made an eloquent plea, and here I should like to read from the debates:

We are sandwiched between the United States territory to the north and south—indeed on all sides but one, and that one opening is towards Canada. Our only option is between remaining a petty, isolated community, 5,000 miles from home—

He was speaking about England.

—eking out a miserable existence on the crumbs of prosperity our powerful and active Republican neighbours chose to allow us, or, by taking our place amongst the comity of nations become the prosperous western outlet on the North Pacific of a young and vigorous people, the eastern boundary of whose possessions is washed by the Atlantic.

• (1500)

I believe it is clear that British Columbians in the beginning of their relationship with Canada understood what Canada was about, and believed in the dream of Canada. I assure you, honourable senators, that that understanding and that belief remain undiminished in British Columbia.

I would like now to turn to an emerging issue in national unity, the political development of Canada's north, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. In the early 1960s I served as a member of the staff of the late Honourable Arthur Laing, then Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In that capacity I became well acquainted with the north and I assisted in the establishment of the Carrothers Commission to report on the political development of the Northwest Territories. That report was a landmark and led to the location of much of the territorial government in Yellowknife, with a resident commissioner there for the first time. Subsequently, it has led to a fully elected territorial council of 15 persons, of whom today nine are of native descent. In other words, honourable senators, in ten years I have seen a process take place in which Ottawa has given up a good deal of administration and control of an area one-third the total size of Canada. I have seen a real transfer of political authority to northern residents, both in the Yukon and in the Northwest Territories, authority exercised by them in a real, although not yet satisfactory, measure.

In the Northwest Territories, one of the territorial ministers, out of three who are also members of the territorial council, is an Inuit, Peter Ernerk, who is responsible for economic development and tourism. He is the first Inuit or Eskimo minister. That shows you something of the evolution of the native community in Canada. In addition, our recently appointed colleague, Senator Willie Adams, was at one time an elected member of the Council of the Northwest Territories, and brings us a real knowledge of what is happening there. I hope he may find the opportunity to speak in this debate on questions of national unity in the north.

Honourable senators, following May 9 and the release of the Berger Report, I pressed the government leader here for a debate on the Berger Report and its reference to a Senate committee so that we might have public hearings and the response of people in the north and elsewhere to the views of Mr. Justice Berger. Senator Perrault has indicated that this debate encompasses my concerns about national unity in the north and the Berger Report. Therefore some of the remarks which I would have made in that debate, I wish to make here.

Let me be clear that Mr. Justice Berger has rendered a national service in providing Canadians with his report, Northern Frontier, Northern Homeland. His work is seeing the communities of the Mackenzie Valley and hearing what the people think is worthy of admiration. His sincerity in reflecting and giving full voice, particularly to the native community, deserves praise. It is vital to our unity that Canadians south of 60 hear and understand the people of the north and appreciate their concerns.

What I question is Mr. Justice Berger's political judgment and political conclusions for the evolution of the political institutions of the north. I am not concerned with the issue of whether at this time or in the immediate future the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories should become provinces. Those territories have always been and are today part of Confederation. They have evolved rapidly in their form of government. Today the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories have their own territorial governments, very much in charge of their day-to-day affairs.

I wish to focus on that critical element of northern life that deals with the role of the native communities in the political process. I concentrate on that issue in particular because of my great concern for the conclusions that Mr. Justice Berger has come to in his report. Honourable senators, if I may refer you to pages 173 to 180 of the reports under the title "Self-Determination and Confederation" Mr. Justice Berger asked this question in beginning the chapter:

Why do the native people in the North insist upon their right to self-determination? Why cannot they be governed by the same political institutions as other Canadians?

Mr. Justice Berger then comments and concludes:

The native people are, therefore, seeking a fundamental reordering of the relations between themselves and the rest of Canada. They are seeking a new Confederation in the North.

The concept of native self-determination must be understood in the context of native claims. When the Dene people refer to themselves as a nation, as many of them have, they are not renouncing Canada or Confederation. Rather they are proclaiming that they are a distinct people, who share a common historical experience, a common set of values, and a common world view.

In other selected portions, Mr. Justice Berger at page 173 asked the question:

Why should the native people be allowed political institutions of their own under the Constitution of Canada, when other groups are not?

He answers as follows:

The answer is simple enough: the native people of the North did not immigrate to Canada as individuals or families expecting to assimilate. Immigrants chose to come and to submit to the Canadian polity: their choices were individuals choices. The Dene and the Inuit were already here, and were forced to submit to the polity imposed upon them. They were here and had their own languages, cultures and histories before the arrival of the French or English. They are the original peoples of Northern Canada. The North was—and is—their homeland.

Then, with respect to the pipeline, he says at page 176:

Both the white and the native people in the North realize that the government's decision on the pipeline and on the way in which native claims are settled, will determine whether the political evolution of the North will follow the pattern of history of the West or whether it will find a place for native ideas of self-determination.

Finally, at page 180 I quote from a proposal to the federal government made by the group in the Northwest Territories calling themselves the Dene:

There will therefore be within Confederation, a Dene government with jurisdiction over a geographical area and over subject matters now within the jurisdiction of the Government of Canada or the Government of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Justice Berger says:

The native people seek a measure of control over land use, and they see that the ownership of the land and political control of land use are intimately linked.

He continues:

These claims leave unanswered many questions that will have to be clarified and resolved through negotiations between the Government of Canada and the native organizations. A vital question, one of great concern to white northerners, is how Yellowknife, Hay River and other communities with white majorities would fit into this scheme. Would they be part of the new territory? Or would they become enclaves within it? It is not my task to try to resolve these difficult questions. Whether native self-determination requires native hegemony over a geographical area, or whether it can be achieved through the transfer of political control over specific matters to the native people, remain questions to be resolved by negotiations.

He then goes on to discuss questions of a guaranteed number of seats on the Territorial Council, questions of political representation for natives similar to that in New Zealand with the Maori, and the desire, again, of the Dene to establish political institutions of their own fashioning.

Very recently—in fact late last week—there was a conference held in Vancouver which is reported in the Vancouver Sun of Saturday, May 28. George Erasmus, who is the President of the Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories, is quoted as saying that political institutions imported from the south destroyed Dene decision-making structures which were more democratic. He also said, "We will have to go through a period of decolonization. That's what we are working for." And a gentleman described as a University of British Columbia professor, Michael Jackson, who was special counsel to Mr. Justice Berger during the Mackenzie Valley pipeline inquiry, said:

The Dene need the interval [that is to say, the 10-year moratorium on pipeline construction] to develop their own political, educational and economic systems to withstand the impact of the pipeline's construction . . . The Dene want their own government in a defined area, with a political system based on consensus rather than majority rule.

Honourable senators, I well appreciate the feelings of natives in the Northwest Territories with respect to what must appear to be a monstrous cultural invasion from the south. I well appreciate what Mr. Justice Berger has to say about the right of people in the north, whites and natives, to reflect their interests on the issue of the construction of a pipeline through the Mackenzie Valley. All of us must ensure that there is no tyranny by the majority over the minority, just as much as in a democracy the minority must ensure it does not tyrannize the majority.

I have stood for a long time for the political evolution of the Northwest Territories. I believe in a transfer, over a period of time, of more and more authority to the Northwest Territories including the administration and a share in the value and benefits of resource developments and production in that area. I cannot see how in the country which I understand to be Canada we can do other than encourage the present process of political development in the Northwest Territories, and that is the encouragement of the natives to take their place in the elective process which leads to representation on the Territorial Council, and to govern people without ethnicity, to govern people without tribal interests, to govern people without tribal representation.

I truly believe that if we try to insert political tests such as ethnicity and tribalism in a country such as ours, those qualities will slowly change the appearance in the minds of Canadians of the value and work of an individual in our society. They will create differentiations that will eventually lead others to hive off, and an entire process of political feudalism will begin. Once begun, it will not stop with natives only. I think it is imperative that the people of southern Canada assure natives in the north of a genuine and even generous role in their affairs—that is, in northern affairs and national affairs generally.

I think we are doing that. Honourable senators are quite aware of, and have approved, the expenditures to which the government is committed in order to foster the political development of northern and other natives. I fear very much indeed, however, that Mr. Justice Berger is giving cause to people like George Erasmus to argue for the establishment of a special Indian state in the Northwest Territories. I have in my possession a statement by the vice-president of the same brotherhood arguing that that is his purpose. I regret I cannot find it in my documents at the moment, but it appeared in one of the native publications within the last few weeks.

I would ask honourable senators to be aware of this problem, and to be concerned with this problem as an emerging issue in our nation's unity.

Honourable senators, I wish to conclude by saying only that I have every confidence and every optimism in the future of our unity. There is no doubt in my mind that the Prime Minister's course, and that of the government, is the correct one. That course is to refuse to negotiate with separatism, wherever it may appear in Canada, and yet to admit that our Confederation is not cast in iron. It is not fixed once and for all in its present form. It is amenable to amendment, and it is amenable to change in the context of the total benefits which all Canadians wish to have from their roles as citizens of this country.

On motion of Senator Cook, debate adjourned.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Second Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.)

Senator Perrault: I yield to Senator Langlois.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I am grateful to my leader for yielding so that I may speak on this item today. I should like to open my remarks by referring to what Senator Flynn said when he spoke in this debate. I regret that my honourable colleague is not in the house today. He is absent on official business on the west coast of Canada.

Senator Grosart: He is here in spirit.

Senator Langlois: In his remarks the honourable senator congratulated the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments for its tireless work in connection with the scrutiny of statutory instruments. I feel I must also congratulate the committee on the amount of work it has done in examining the great number of statutory instruments that have been made since the Statutory Instruments Act came into force. I wish also to avail myself of this opportunity to offer my most sincere congratulations to our colleague, Senator Forsey, for his most excellent introduction of the committee's second report to this chamber.

I must say, however, that I am concerned with some of the statements that have been made in connection with the second report of the committee, both in the report itself and by senators who have taken part in this debate.

When Senator Flynn spoke he stated that much of the present subordinate legislation seems not to be founded in law. I do not accept this as being an accurate analysis of what the report in fact states. In the introduction of its report, the committee indicated that out of the 1,348 instruments it examined there were only 24 instances where it was not satisfied with explanations provided to it by the various departments of government. In that portion of the report under the committee's terms of reference for headings dealing with examination of the authority for statutory instruments, only a few statutory instruments have been cited as examples of where the committee feels there was no authority.

I do not know how many statutory instruments have been found by the committee to be lacking in authority—the report unfortunately does not say—but from the examples given it does not appear that it is any such number as would support the sweeping statements that have been made in this debate that suggest that the government has in the main been operating illegally when it comes to statutory instruments.

Senator Flynn also spoke, as did others, in this debate about the matter of the difficulties that arose between the committee and the Department of Justice. Senator Flynn suggested that the reason the Department of Justice refused to provide legal opinions to the committee was that it had something to hide or that the opinion, if given, would support the committee's views that the instruments in question were ultra vires.

This was not the reason given by the Minister of Justice. In fact, the minister explained to the committee that under the Department of Justice Act the department can only provide legal advice to the government. The minister also explained to the committee that traditionally the Justice Department has never provided legal opinions to Parliament or its committees because to do so would create difficulties concerning the solicitor-client relationship that exists between the department and the government.

For some reason the committee seems to feel that the legal advice it gets from its counsel is not sufficient, and if it relies on it alone it could be embarrassed if it turns out to be wrong. The wording of the committee report under the heading "Withholding of Information from the Committee" in item 76 A(i) of the report states that if the committee does not get legal explanations from the Department of Justice, and the opinion of its own counsel turns out to be wrong, "the committee would then appear foolish and would in short measure become either discredited or overcautious." I see this as a small consideration compared with the results that could occur if the committee received legal advice from two sources, one of which is tied to its client, the government. The committee is independent of the government, and it seems to me that government lawyers should not be given an opportunity of influencing the committee in its task of deciding where a statutory instrument stands legally. The committee should take its advice from its own counsel, and not from counsel for the Crown who is affected by the best interests of its client, the government.

In any event, what would come of a situation where the committee's counsel and the Justice Department do not agree? Where does it leave the committee? Would it then want an opinion from another legal adviser? Where would it all end? It seems to me that legal counsel must analyze a legal problem from both sides, and then render an opinion. If lawyers stood about waiting to hear the views of lawyers from the other side, nothing would get done in the business of law, and I hardly think the committee could expect to accomplish its massive work if it stood about waiting to hear what the government lawyers have to say. The proposition that the committee would be embarrassed if it turned out that it made an incorrect decision on the validity of an instrument is, in my view, not really valid.

On the whole, the committee's report is, I think, a bit too legalistic for many to comprehend. As one newspaper put it: "The whole report is suffused with the kind of precious verbiage which would offend even constitutional lawyers." I am inclined to agree, and I am not convinced that the emphasis on legal issues and matters is particularly useful to us or anyone else in a report of this nature. Perhaps in future reports the committee will be a little more specific about the numbers of instruments it thinks are illegal, and we will not be left to wade through the technical and legal discussions and to guess at the extent of the supposed illegalities in instruments. Frankly, I wonder whether complexity of this report does not do more to make the committee's work inaccessible to the public.

The report also goes to great lengths to point out what the committee feels were defects in procedural matters regarding statutory instruments. As far as I can ascertain from the report, most of these procedural problems have been cured or are in the process of being cured, and I fail to see why the committee pursued the matter to such lengths when it seems to be more or less resolved.

The report also points out what the committee feels are defects in the Statutory Instruments Act. What it really boils down to is that the committee disagrees with the Department of Justice as to what the definition of "statutory instrument" in the act means. It seems to me that this matter should be taken up by the committee with the Minister of Justice who is responsible for the act, and if amendments to the act are felt necessary the minister would probably be quite willing to do whatever is needed to alleviate the difficulties by way of amendment of the legislation.

The committee has now tabled its third report, and I would like to speak briefly to it. The third report expresses the committee's view that the recent increase in postal rates under the authority of section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act is an unusual or unexpected use of that authority. The report suggests that postal rates should be increased only by means of amendment of the Post Office Act by Parliament, and not by means of the Financial Administration Act.

In my view, the committee has made a curious distinction in how it construes something to be unusual or unexpected. Under section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act, fees for service may be increased by orders in council. The committee has not taken issue with the legality of what was done, but has taken issue with the propriety of using the Financial Administration Act to do it.

In 1973 the fees set out in the Copyright Act and the Industrial Design Act were amended pursuant to orders in council under section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act, and the committee, when it examined the instruments by which this was done, thought they were proper and did not contest them. Yet when the fees in the Post Office Act were recently amended in the same manner, the committee says it is an unusual and unexpected use of that provision in the Financial Administration Act.

I find it difficult to accept the distinction that the committee makes in support of this report when it says in effect that it is all right to change fees under one type of statute but not under another using the authority in question. Section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act does not make any distinction as to the type of statute that it can be used for. It says, "... notwithstanding the provisions of any Act ...". Consequently, I am not convinced that there is anything unusual or unexpected about what was done.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL UNITY

STATEMENT BY VANCOUVER BOARD OF TRADE

En route to maturity, each nation must go through its own ordeal, its testing time. For Canada and Canadians, the time of testing is now.

The Vancouver Board of Trade believes that, in order for Canada to survive as a nation, Canadians—at this moment—must individually and collectively—make a commitment to united Canada.

The position of the Board of Trade is plain.

We want an undivided Canada.

We want all our fellow citizens whose first or only language is French to remain in Canada.

We believe that, with common purpose, understanding and goodwill, together we can maintain the unity of our country while preserving its two official languages and its many cultures.

We believe that, together, we can achieve the climate and the circumstances which will make it possible for those whose first or only language is French to meet their linguistic, cultural and economic aspirations within a united Canada.

We pledge our understanding of and support for those aspirations.

We will give every consideration to and support for those whose purpose is to keep Canada together.

We value and defend the differences and diversities which, in total, constitute our heritage and our future.

We accept that this country faces many problems. We do not accept that any problem has more importance or significance than the problem of national unity.

We hold that our national will to remain strong and undivided must be expressed by individual attitudes and actions and that when our national will has been made plain and positive, that simple action of itself will provide the impetus and energy to solve our other problems.

The times call for strong voices, speaking clearly.

The Vancouver Board of Trade invites and urges all Canadians to make their own personal commitment to the principle of one undivided Canada and to make that commitment publicly.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

ROSS DAM—SKAGIT VALLEY FLOODING—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question of urgency and importance for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, of which notice in writing was given to him yesterday afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

Senator Austin: I regret that Senator Flynn was away and that as a consequence I could not speak to him about this matter.

1. Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate aware of reports from Olympia, Washington, that the Washington State Governor, Dixy Lee Ray, has announced that she has reversed the previous position of the State of Washington on the Ross Dam, which was not to construct any additional work on the Skagit River in order to avoid flooding and environmental damage in Canada, and that she now proposes to raise the height of the Ross Dam by 122½ feet, which would flood over 5,000 acres in the Skagit Valley in British Columbia?

2. Can the Leader of the Government in fact advise whether Governor Dixy Lee Ray is now in favour of the Skagit Valley flooding, and whether it is legally possible, under arrangements between Canada and the United States, for this newly proposed construction to take place?

3. Will the Leader of the Government advise this chamber whether the Government of Canada has been asked by the Province of British Columbia to take any steps to counter Governor Ray's decision, and whether the Province of British Columbia either proposes to hold direct discussions with Governor Ray, or to ask the federal government to make representations to the United States State Department to be communicated to Governor Ray?

4. If the reports about Governor Ray's new position are true, then in view of that unfriendly policy towards British Columbia would the Government of Canada, after consultation with the Province of British Columbia, be prepared to withhold any accommodation requested by officials or agencies of the United States federal government, or of the State of Washington, which would have the effect of increasing stream flow of Canadian rivers which flow into the State of Washington to accommodate United States users who are suffering from partial drought conditions, until such time as the Ross Dam matter has been cleared up to Canada's satisfaction?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Austin for providing me with prior notice of this rather detailed question, and I welcome the opportunity to reiterate the government's position on the Skagit flooding question. This position is well known to United States and Washington State authorities. It was recently expressed in an aide-mémoire delivered by our embassy in Washington to the United States Department of State on February 25 of this year. The aide-mémoire reiterates the firm opposition of the Canadian government to the proposed flooding, and supports, as the best means for resolving the situation, the on-going discussions between the Province of British Columbia and the City of Seattle, the parties whose interests are most directly at stake. This is also the position held by the Government of British Columbia. Following a recent exchange of views on this subject with provincial authorities, federal officials are now considering appropriate steps to facilitate continued negotiations between British Columbia and Seattle with a view to reaching a mutually satisfactory conclusion.

These actions were in train well before Governor Ray's latest statement on the issue, about which I have only the same media information as the honourable senator. We would not consider it necessary to reply directly to these statements, since the matter is before the United States Federal Power Commission, rather than the State of Washington, for approval. I understand that a final decision from the FPC is not expected in the immediate future. There is, therefore, likely to be a considerable delay before the raising of the dam can legally be commenced, giving time for the British Columbia-Seattle negotiations to proceed. Our aide-mémoire of last February, in fact, suggests that the FPC and other outside agencies refrain from intervention in the Skagit question pending direct resolution by the local parties.

The Canadian government would not consider it beneficial to add to the controversy by tying the Skagit flooding question together with other Canada-United States issues such as increased stream-flows in rivers flowing into Washington State. It is our view that the best long-term resolution of the difficulties to the benefit of both British Columbia and Washington State lies in increased overall cooperation and mutual consideration, rather than confrontation in areas such as energy and the environment. We will continue to work towards this end.

If further information is made available by the Department of External Affairs or other sources within government, it will be communicated immediately to the Senate.

Senator Austin: I might point out to the Leader of the Government that although the Canadian government may not find it beneficial, the comparison between accommodation in today's world as requested by U.S. officials, and the possibilities of promises in the future of friendly behaviour towards British Columbians, is not a very good deal. I would hope that the Canadian government would keep in mind that there are acre-feet of water behind the Mica Dam which we have no obligation to release into the Columbia River system—

Senator Flynn: Order.

Senator Austin: Thank you very much, Senator Flynn.

Senator Grosart: There is no debate on questions.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, I have always felt that one of the most commendable aspects of the Senate is that there is a degree of flexibility permitted in matters of unquestioned importance to the country. I know that honourable senators have unfailingly shown tolerance in this direction in the past, and I hope that they will in the future.

Senator Grosart: We might also observe our rules.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, if you wish to make remarks would you please rise from your seat in the appropriate fashion?

Senator Flynn: You should address that to Senator Greene.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that the important observations of Senator Austin will be communicated to the appropriate areas in government. The Skagit situation will be monitored closely. And, as I have said before, any additional information will be communicated to the honourable members of the Senate as quickly as possible. The question of possible Skagit Valley flooding, together with certain other questions in other provinces, is of some importance to Canada nationally.

TRANSPORTATION

FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN NORTH SYDNEY, NOVA SCOTIA, AND PORT-AUX-BASQUES, NEWFOUNDLAND—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on May 12, Senator Duggan asked a series of questions with respect to the ferry service between North Sydney, Nova Scotia and Port-aux-Basques, Newfoundland. The first question was:

Can the Leader of the Government advise whether it is necessary to have a reservation to sail to Newfoundland via CN Marine ferries during the tourist season of 1977?

Technically, it is not necessary, but as a full reservation system for the convenience of the travelling public is in effect through toll-free service, the travelling public would be wise to avail themselves of this service. The second question was:

If the answer to question No. 1 is "yes," was approval for this range of policy granted by the Canadian Transport Commission to the CN operating ferry service between North Sydney, Nova Scotia, and Port-aux-Basques, Newfoundland?

The answer is:

No, the Canadian Transport Commission does not have jurisdiction over the operations of CN Marine.

Because the answer to the second question is "No," a third question asked by Senator Duggan is not applicable.

THE HONOURABLE PAUL YUZYK

FELICITATIONS ON HONORARY DEGREE

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to draw your attention to a happy event which took place recently. I refer to the conferring on Senator Paul Yuzyk of the degree of Doctor of Laws, honoris causa, at the University of Saskatchewan, on May 19, 1977, by the Chancellor, the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker.

● (1420)

The citation is too long for me to read now—of course, it would have to be lengthy in order to describe, even in a concise way, the work of our distinguished colleague—so I should like to quote from a publication called On Campus 77, which is a bi-weekly newsletter published by the University of Saskatchewan. Referring to the degrees which were to be conferred, it had this to say about Senator Yuzyk:

Senator Yuzyk has had a distinguished career as a teacher, scholar and politician, and has been widely honoured for initiating the movement to have Canada recognized as a multi-cultural nation. The policy of multiculturalism which he vigorously promoted was adopted by Parliament in 1971.

A graduate of the Universities of Saskatchewan and Minnesota, he has taught history and Slavic studies at the University of Manitoba and is presently a professor at the University of Ottawa, where he teaches Russian history and Canadian-Soviet relations.

He has written books concerning the place and role of Ukrainian Canadians in the life of the nation and the social history of Ukrainians in Manitoba. A collection of his speeches in the Canadian Senate, entitled "For a Better Canada", has been widely read throughout the nation. He has also collaborated in the writing of several books and has written a variety of articles, many of them dealing with ethnic questions and multi-culturalism. In addition, he directed a seven-year research project entitled "Statistical Compendium on the Ukrainians in Canada, 1891-1971".

Senator Yuzyk organized the 1968 Thinkers' Conference on Canadian cultural rights, which was the first national conference of ethnic groups in Canadian history. He has also participated as a resource leader or speaker at conferences across Canada dealing with Canada's cultural mosaic.

He founded the Ukrainian National Youth Federation of Canada, the Ukrainian Canadian University Students' Union, and the Canadian Association of Slavists. Among a variety of other positions, he has served as president of the Ukrainian Cultural and Educational Centre in Winnipeg, director of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, and chairman of the Human Rights Commission, World Congress of Free Ukrainians.

In 1973, he received the Gold Medal of the Ukrainian Canadian Committee. He had previously been awarded the Shevchenko Gold Medal and Gold Medal of the City of Sudbury.

I am sure honourable senators join with me in congratulating our colleague on this honour which has been bestowed on him, an honour which has been richly deserved.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, as a senator from Saskatchewan I should like to agree with everything that has been said by Senator Macdonald in tribute to Senator Yuzyk. Not only are Saskatchewan citizens of Ukrainian origin and descent extremely proud, as they should be, of Senator Yuzyk and his accomplishments, but all people in Saskatchewan, no matter what their country of origin, are proud of the leadership he has given in this most important field.

It is my honour to sit in this chamber with Senator Yuzyk. He is one of the hardest working members of this house. He is tireless in the pursuit of his ideals and objectives, and those ideals and objectives are most worthy. I believe this honorary doctorate brings honour not only to Senator Yuzyk but to the Senate itself, to the work of the Senate and to all Canadians who cherish democratic freedom.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is entirely appropriate for Senator Macdonald to bring to our attention the great honour paid to one of our colleagues. Senator Yuzyk joins that great line of senators who over the years have brought distinction and honour to this chamber, those senators who have been awarded honorary degrees by the leading educational institutions in this country.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to associate myself with the tributes paid by Senator Macdonald and Senator Argue? I have been closely associated with Senator Yuzyk. I confide that not only did we go to church together, but we shared the same apartment. His sagacity has assisted me many times. Without making a long speech, I must say that he is an outstanding scholar, an outstanding Canadian and an outstanding senator.

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I deem it a very high honour to have received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from my alma mater, the University of Saskatchewan. It was, indeed, a proud moment in my life when the degree was conferred on me by the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker, the Chancellor of the university, and the distinguished former Prime Minister of Canada who was responsible for my appointment to the Senate nearly 15 years ago—an unusual set of circumstances from a historical viewpoint.

Of course, this honour brings me everlasting happiness and satisfaction as it is in recognition of the work I have been doing, and shall continue to do, in the Senate and in the academic field for the good of my country, Canada. It particularly notes my contributions to the promotion and development of multiculturalism as a national policy of unity, and to human rights here and in eastern Europe, which I profoundly appreciate.

I am, indeed, most grateful to Senator Macdonald for bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate, to the government leader, Senator Perrault, to Senator Argue, and to my close friend Senator Bélisle, for their kind expressions. I also thank my colleagues in this chamber for their congratulations and warm applause, which have made this honour more meaningful to me.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE HONOURABLE GUY WILLIAMS

FELICITATIONS ON HONORARY DEGREE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I draw your attention to the fact that another of our colleagues, a distinguished Canadian of native Indian descent, Senator Guy Williams, had conferred upon him last weekend the degree of Doctor of Laws, honoris causa, by Simon Fraser University in British Columbia, for his great contribution to his province and to the advancement of the native peoples of our nation.

Senator Williams has the warmest best wishes of all his Senate colleagues on the occasion of this high honour.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

SOLAR ENERGY APPLICATION BILL

SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, for the second reading of the Bill C-309, intituled: "An Act respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy", and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that the bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for consideration and report.—(Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on Thursday, May 26, 1977, the Senate resumed the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-309, "An Act respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy." During the course of the debate, the Honourable Senator Godfrey moved, in amendment, that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for examination and report. During the debate on the Honourable Senator Godfrey's motion in amendment, the Honourable Senator Molson raised a point of order concerning the nature of the bill when he asked for a ruling on whether or not rule 94 of the Rules of the Senate applies to Bill C-309. Rule 94 reads as follows:

After its first reading and before its consideration by any other committee, a private bill from the House of Commons, for which no petition has been received by the Senate, shall be taken into consideration and reported on by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders in like manner as a petition.

Since rule 94 speaks of a "private bill from the House of Commons, for which no petition has been received by the Senate," it is clear that the Honourable Senator Molson, in raising a point of order in respect of this rule, is seeking a ruling on whether or not Bill C-309, which is from the House of Commons and for which no petition has been received by the Senate, is, in fact, a private bill that must be dealt with in accordance with Rule 94.

In speaking of the distinctive character of private bills and the manner in which they are passed in the British House of Commons, Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, Nineteenth Edition, at page 857, states the following:

Private bills are bills for the particular interest or benefit of any person or persons. Whether they be for the interest of an individual, of a public company or corporation, or of a county, district or other locality, they are equally distinguished from measures of public policy; and this distinction is marked in the very manner of their introduction.

The essential difference in procedure between a public bill and a private bill is that, whereas a public bill is either presented direct to the House or introduced on motion by a Member of Parliament, a private bill is solicited by the parties who are interested in promoting it and is founded upon a petition which must be duly deposited in accordance with standing orders. Furthermore, the payment of fees by the promoters is an indispensable condition of its progress.

While there may be some differences of opinion among honourable senators as to the principle of Bill C-309 and its objects, and while some may argue that in substance it has more of the characteristics of a private bill than of a public bill, the facts, as revealed by the proceedings in the House of Commons, are that this bill was not solicited by interested parties, it was not founded on a petition and no fees were paid prior to its introduction. Instead, the bill was introduced by a Member of Parliament as a private member's public bill and was treated as such during the entire course of its progress through the House of Commons.

In view of the discussion that took place on the point of order, it will be of interest to honourable senators to note that in Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, Nineteenth Edition, at page 872, it is pointed out that:

It is, in any event, a more difficult task to argue that a public bill should have been brought in upon petition than vice versa, since many bills will contain some element of public policy which, while insufficient to debar a bill from proceeding as a private bill should it be introduced as such, will yet sustain it if introduced as a public bill.

Rule 94 is contained in Part VII of the Rules of the Senate. Part VII deals exclusively with the procedure relating to private bills in the Senate. Private bills can only be introduced on petition since their purpose is to provide for exceptions to the general law. While a private bill may be initiated in either house, a separate petition must be filed with each house prior to its introduction in that house. Rule 94, in my opinion, is intended to apply only to a private bill that has been introduced on petition in the House of Commons, has been passed by that house and has received first reading in the Senate, but in respect of which no petition has been received by the Senate.

In the present case, Bill C-309 was introduced in the House of Commons as a private member's public bill. It was not founded on a petition sponsored by interested parties and it was not subjected to any of the procedures relating to private bills. While some senators may argue that the bill should have been founded on a petition, the point of order that has been raised has to do with whether or not rule 94 applies to the bill as received from the House of Commons. Procedurally, it was received from the House of Commons as a public bill. Thus, from a procedural point of view it cannot in the present circumstances be regarded as a private bill. In my opinion, therefore, rule 94 does not apply in the circumstances, and I rule that the Honourable Senator Molson's point of order is not well taken.

The Chair is grateful to all honourable senators who have taken part in the discussion on this point of order and who have presented learned arguments in a conscientious and intelligent manner.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED—SECOND READING

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, now that the ruling by Madam Speaker has disposed of the point of order raised by Senator Molson, it is clear that Senator Godfrey's motion in amendment is in order, and that it can be discussed on its merits. This means that the subject matter of this bill can be referred to a standing committee before the question is put for adoption of the bill on second reading.

I intend to make some brief remarks on the merits of the motion in amendment by Senator Godfrey. I am going to support this motion in amendment for two reasons, but with the understanding that if the amendment by Senator Godfrey carries and the subject matter is referred to a committee, that committee will report so that a decision can be reached on second reading when the bill comes back to the chamber. In this connection, I think Senator Godfrey was very clear that the intent of his motion was not to kill the bill, but to seek further information in order that we could decide on the principle of the bill with more information than we now have.

This having been said, I have two reasons for supporting Senator Godfrey's amendment. First, we are dealing here with a bill which proposes the creation of an institute for solar energy, a private corporation. Although we are dealing with a public bill sponsored by a private member, it is not clear in my mind why the promoters who are at present unknown to us have not sought to proceed by letters patent in the ordinary way, without going through the procedure of having a bill presented in Parliament.

Secondly, since the principle of the bill is the creation of a private corporation, how can we assess it on second reading when so many questions governing its incorporation and its purpose remain at this stage unanswered?

I should like now to refer to some interesting remarks made on this subject by my deskmate, Senator Hicks, who wondered why the National Research Council, for example, would not have had something to do with such an important subject at this time.

Having said that, honourable senators, I must say I will support the amendment. However, I should like to make it perfectly clear that I understand the importance to Canada of research in solar energy at this time and, in my opinion, immediate steps should be taken in that direction, but I would prefer to have before us a government bill on the matter. Nevertheless, because of the importance of having additional sources of energy, unless there are extenuating circumstances indicated in the report from the committee when it reaches us, my intention is to support the bill on second and third readings on the assumption that we have obtained the information which Senator Godfrey is seeking. I should like to be clear on that point.

Most senators who have spoken on this matter have been quite clear on the fact that the intent of the amendment is not to kill the bill, but to seek further information. The suggestion that the intention is to kill the bill has, I think, made many senators uneasy, and I should like Senator Austin to clarify his position and tell us why he would not support Senator Godfrey's amendment. After all, that amendment will permit the promoters to be heard and will give them a chance to answer all of our questions. The Senate will find it more easy to deal with the question of principle on second reading when the committee makes its report.

Senator Austin: If I may answer Senator Deschatelets's question, the purpose of the bill is to further the commercial application of solar energy in Canada.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Grosart: No, it is not.

Senator Austin: The purpose of the bill is to mark for public attention, by its passage through Parliament, the high degree of importance which should be given to renewable energy resources in Canada in the coming era of energy shortages.

The bill, as I said when I began my address on second reading, is deficient in certain aspects of definition and of its constitutional structure. But the Senate must take into account the fact that this bill has passed all three readings in the House of Commons. Its principle has been adopted there.

Senator Asselin: That is no reason for us to adopt it.

Senator Austin: I would urge honourable senators to give serious purport to the legislative efforts of the House of Commons. I would ask honourable senators to pass this bill on second reading, and then allow it to go to committee, as I said it should, in order to have answered all questions which they have with respect to its scientific importance, economic viability, and even procedural character. With all respect to Senator Deschatelets, I see a difference between having those questions asked in the Banking Committee, after approval in principle of this bill by this chamber—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Molson: That is not the question Senator Deschatelets asked you.

Senator Austin: I beg your pardon, Senator Molson?

Senator Molson: That is not what Senator Deschatelets asked you. He asked you why you would not support the amendment.

Senator Austin: I am saying to Senator Deschatelets that I see a difference in principle between having those questions answered after approval on second reading and having them answered in committee before the bill is given second reading, in which case the bill will have been sent to committee by this chamber without its approval in principle. I greatly fear, regardless of the good intentions of Senator Deschatelets and those of Senator Godfrey, that if this bill does not have this chamber's support in principle when it is before the committee then, there will not be a feeling of responsibility in the members of the committee to improve it and report it back to this chamber with amendments. Therefore, I say to honourable senators that if this chamber accepts Senator Godfrey's amendment we stand in great danger of being understood by the country as not interested in the development of renewable energy.

Senator Grosart: Nonsense.

Senator Austin: And I would like to say to Senator Flynn that I like his jacket.

Senator Flynn: That is the only sensible remark you have made this afternoon.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words in support of the bill and against the amendment. Most of what I intended to say has already been said by Senator Austin, who was too quick for me when I tried to catch the Speaker's eye.

If this bill were being initiated in this house I would support the amendment, because I think the amendment is the correct procedure. However, that is not the case, as Senator Austin has pointed out. This bill has already passed the other place. Admittedly, it has defects. Nevertheless, this is the first time I can remember that we in this chamber have rejected a bill, or failed to send it to committee, because it contained defects. Practically every bill coming to us from the other place has defects. The normal procedure is to send bills to the appropriate committees to have those defects corrected. I see no good reason why we should single this particular bill out for different treatment.

Surely, there is no doubt in anyone's mind here that the Banking Committee, and its able chairman, will scrutinize this bill in such a way that the concerns of various senators will be taken into account and the interests of the Senate protected. Surely, the same results can be achieved and questions can be answered, and the bill reported back in a proper form, if that committee sees fit to do so. If the committee, after examining the bill and hearing witnesses, decides that that bill should not be proceeded with, then all we have to do is adopt the committee's report.

I agree with Senator Austin that Senator Godfrey's amendment, although it is made with the best of intentions, is a procedure which at this particular stage in the session might well result in killing the bill. That is a risk we ought not to take. No one who has spoken against the bill has given any good reason why the bill should be killed. They have pointed out its defects, but we have a way of correcting those. We should adopt the normal procedure that we follow with every bill. We should send the bill to committee and have it corrected there.

Senator Austin: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Is he aware that on May 25 Senator Flynn urged this house to kill the bill?

Senator Flynn: Yes, but more in the sense of an abortion.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, first let me deal with one matter that was raised, namely, why this is being dealt with by Parliament rather than by letters patent. I believe the answer is that it is a new undertaking and there is the prestige of Parliament as compared with letters patent. I understand that thoroughly. They had a choice and this is the choice they made.

We should not lose sight of one thing, that to bring this bill before this house is an amazing achievement. Those of us who have spent years in the House of Commons cannot recall an occasion when a private member was able to get a public bill through that house. There is very little time for it. One needs patience, and it has to be something which has wide appeal.

In this case the matter came up quickly. They did not really expect that the house would call it and go on with it, and some of the things that might have been put in the bill did not get into it.

What Senator Carter has said reminds me of what took place on Wednesday, May 25, when we resumed the debate on the motion for second reading of the Petroleum Corporations Monitoring Bill. Honourable senators will recall that Senator Grosart made a formidable speech and asked a number of important questions. Senator Barrow said that he would try to provide the answers later. The next day he was able to provide some of them, and he told Senator Grosart that the remainder of the questions would be answered in the usual way when the bill was before the appropriate committee. He then moved that the bill be referred to committee.

That is the normal procedure here. When a senator moves that a bill be referred to a committee, I am not concerned with his intentions. We either approve or disapprove of a bill. There are no "maybes" about a bill, but they have been thrown into the discussion. It is a question of yes or no.

Any information that is necessary will be adduced before the committee and the committee will report. It is as simple as that. That has been our practice for as long as I or any other senator can remember. That is the way we deal with these matters. When someone tells me, "Well, a bank does it this or that way, and names the directors," I know that after the bill is passed new directors, persons who were not named originally, appear on the scene. There is nothing sacrosanct about naming directors.

Senator Flynn: How will you proceed to name them?

Senator Croll: The matter will be proceeded with by asking the sponsor of the bill what he has in mind, and if we are not satisfied we will vote against it.

Senator Flynn: That is not in the legislation.

Senator Croll: The government welcomed this bill as it never welcomed another bill in all the years that I can remember. Clause 4 says:

Nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to require an appropriation of public revenue or an expenditure out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

We should endorse this bill immediately.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I think I can say in all honesty that in all my years as a parliamentarian at the provincial level and in the Senate I have never witnessed such an exercise in futility as this debate.

It seems to me that we have a clear issue before us. We have a bill that has gone through the normal process of three readings in the other place, and here we are trying to give sober second thought, as was said a few days ago, to something which is really important not only to the Canadian people but to mankind—the harnessing of solar energy. Members of this chamber, who should be among the brightest in the land, are quarreling over the matter of an amendment to a motion—an amendment which could have the effect of delaying the eventual passage of the legislation. What other effect can it have? What is the difference whether we vote for the motion or for the amendment to the motion? To me it makes absolutely no difference so long as the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as soon as possible, is in possession of the bill and can call witnesses and proceed to study it.

I cannot, in all conscience, support the amendment, although I am sympathetic to Senator Godfrey. What is the reason for moving this amendment? I do not even know why I have to stand here today and take a few minutes of honourable senators' time to say how frustrated I am by that motion.

The committee will hear all the witnesses, and will report to this house, regardless of whether the bill receives second reading today, tomorrow, next week, or the week after. The bill will go before the committee eventually, so why not send it to the committee right away? The members of the committee are adults; they can handle the matter and report the bill back in amended form, if they so wish, or perhaps kill it, if they so wish. However, I hope that it will be reported back.

While I was listening to the remarks which have been made I wrote down some words, and I believe that for the record I should read them: "If the sun had as much energy to waste as is being wasted today in this debate on a simple matter of procedure, then let us through research find ways and means to harness such energy for the benefit of mankind."

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Does the honourable senator—

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator wishes to speak, he should rise at the appropriate time to do so. He should allow other honourable senators the opportunity to speak. He has had enough experience to understand this basic principle.

Honourable senators, I believe we all appreciate the remarks made by Senator Robichaud. I say it is time to have the question put. I urge the defeat of this amendment, and the second reading of the bill. Let us get it to committee, where it can be reviewed in detail.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Government has already spoken on the amendment. Is he asking leave to speak again?

Senator Perrault: I understand that I spoke on the motion for second reading. I do not believe that I have spoken on the amendment.

Hon. Senators: Question.

● (1500)

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côté, that this bill be now read the second time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that the bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for examination and report.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those who are against please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the motion in amendment is lost.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I declare the motion in amendment lost. The debate is now resumed on the main motion.

Hon. Senators: Question.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Austin speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I stand only for the purpose of closing the debate and thanking the honourable senators who supported the defeat of the amendment.

Senator Flynn: That is irrelevant. You are out of it.

MOTION TO REFER BILL TO COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Flynn: Now.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. The Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cottréau, that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Is it your pleasure honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I suppose, taking my lead from Senator Robichaud, I should say that I regret having to take up more of the time of this house. I say this because it seems, according to Senator Robichaud, that time taken up in debate in this house is time wasted. The members on the other side of the house, it appears, are so busy, especially Senator Robichaud, that they cannot stay here longer than a few minutes.

The motion is to refer this bill—

Senator Robichaud: On a point of order, I would like to state to the Leader of the Opposition that I at no time said that I could not stay here for a few minutes. Perhaps he would act as the gentleman I know him to be and withdraw that statement.

Senator Flynn: I do not have to withdraw. That is what Senator Robichaud said a few minutes ago.

Senator Langlois: Be a gentleman, for once.

Senator Perrault: Don't let the polls bother you so much.

Senator Flynn: There is nothing wrong with what I said. I was merely referring to the point made by Senator Robichaud, that this was a ridiculous debate, causing us only to lose time, et cetera. Every time opposition is raised in this place, one hears groans from the other side. If it is not from Senator Robichaud it is from Senator Denis.

Senator Robichaud: On a point of order, I still state that at no time did I say that I did not have time to stay here for more than a few minutes. This is the statement attributed to me by the Leader of the Opposition. This is the point I would like him to withdraw.

Senator Flynn: I will accept that you never said that. I do not think that I said anything that meant that you used precisely those words. But the gist of what you said gave me that impression. As I said, if one doesn't hear groans from Senator Robichaud, they will be heard from Senator Denis or especially from my good friend Senator Langlois. This invariably happens when we have the audacity to oppose any bill.

Senator Perrault: Let's gallop along now.

Senator Flynn: I will gallop at the pace I choose, and certainly not at a pace chosen by a government leader. Senator Perrault came to the rescue of one of the government's supporters in the other place. I do not mind that. It was quite obvious that the Senate's Grits wanted to present a gift to the sponsor of the bill in the other place. That is all very touching. But what they are really telling the Senate to do is make a decision on a stillborn piece of legislation. It cannot be passed. I would dare the government to let it pass third reading now, without reference to the committee.

Senator Perrault: We would want it to go to the committee.

Senator Flynn: You don't want to have the bill given third reading now because you know very well that it is not a piece of legislation that can be adopted as it now stands, with all its deficiencies. In any event, you want to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I have no objection. But since the sponsor of the bill and all those who spoke in favour of the bill insist that the principle of the bill is not to create an institute but to promote solar energy, it therefore is a scientific matter and should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. If you want to act logically and consistently with the decision you have just taken, honourable senators, this is a matter of solar energy and of science and must be sent to the Health, Welfare and Science Committee. That, in my view, is quite obvious.

Therefore, I move that the motion be amended by striking out the words "Banking, Trade and Commerce", and substituting therefor the words "Health, Welfare and Science".

• (1520)

Senator Austin: I refer honourable senators to rule 67(k), which establishes the terms of reference for the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, part of which refer to "natural resources and mines."

Senator Flynn: Natural resources?

Senator Langlois: The sun is a natural resource, of course.

Senator Grosart: I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Grosart, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald, that further debate on the motion in amendment be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Langlois: Claude Wagner won't like that.

The Hon. the Speaker: This motion is not debatable.

Senator Robichaud: I think, to be completely fair, Senator Grosart is perfectly within his rights to adjourn the debate. I don't like it, because it is still another delaying tactic, but he is perfectly entitled to adjourn the debate.

Senator Asselin: It is not debatable.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will put the question again and ask honourable senators to say "yea" or "nay." Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion? Will those who are in favour please say "yea"?

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, as I understand it, this is a motion to adjourn the debate; that is what we are adopting, as I understand.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is a motion for adjournment of the debate. Will those who are in favour please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those who are against please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

Senator Flynn: If the "nays" have it we will call for a vote, but I think the "yeas" have it.

Senator Grosart: On a point of order. Could I ask the Honourable the Speaker to repeat her statement as to the result of the poll by voices?

The Hon. the Speaker: I said that the "nays" have it.

Senator Flynn: We will call a vote on that.

Senator Grosart: Very much so.

Senator Flynn: We will see whether you are going to refuse the adjournment all the time. This is a precedent.

And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

EXCISE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND (No. 2)—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Ewasew, for the second reading of the Bill C-54, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act (No. 2)".—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Senator Macdonald: I yield to the Honourable Senator Grosart.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, yesterday we discussed Bill No. 2 of the session to amend the Customs Tariff. The bill before us today is the second bill of the session to amend the Excise Tax Act. There is a connection between the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act which is not always recognized; nevertheless, it is there.

This particular bill has the usual features in that there are increases to, exemptions from, and adjustments of the existing provisions of the Excise Tax Act, but there is one very unusual feature which has become controversial. Perhaps it is less controversial than the matter we have just dealt with, and I doubt that it will raise the same climate in the Senate. However, it will be my duty to comment particularly on that controversial aspect of the bill.

I said there is a connection between the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act. It arises from the fact that very often suggestions are made that amendments to the Excise Tax Act be used as trade-offs for changes in the Customs Tariff. One expert put it rather well when he said:

Bearing in mind the fact that many industries and producers in Canada believe that this country is a saint in a world of sinners as far as tariffs and trade are concerned, I should like to ask the minister this: do we intend to take a hard stand so that we are not the first to give things away as in the past? Will we be conceding tariff levels which are of importance to the electronics industry, for example, or mobile home manufacturers, or producers of farm products, to improve the position, say, of natural resources or CANDU reactors? Or will the minister go—

The reference, of course, was to the Tokyo Round.

—in with a hard line, such as I understand the United States intends to adopt, so that we may be able to put our unemployed to work in the manufacturing industry or in small business?

The reason that this connects with the Excise Tax Act is that the alternative suggestion has been made that where Customs Tariff changes are disadvantageous to some individuals or some businesses, relief should be given to those individuals or businesses by exemptions in the Income Tax Act. Secondly, there is a direct reference to the Customs Tariff in clause 18 of the bill before us, in which the Customs Tariff is used to designate certain products which this present act would exempt from one of the excise taxes, namely, the sales tax.

It appears to me that this type of argument in favour of trade-offs with respect to the Excise Tax Act makes a good deal of sense, because nowhere in the whole revenue area of the government can a better case be made for a reduction in the provisions which provide the revenues of the government.

Customs duties provide no more than 6 per cent of total revenues, which translates into not quite $2 billion. On the other hand, excise duties, sales tax, and other excise taxes provide—and this may surprise some honourable senators—over $6 billion, or 21 per cent, of the total of some $30 billion in revenues. Personal income tax, which is the major item, accounts for 41 per cent of total revenues, while corporate taxes account for some 19 per cent. The balance is derived from miscellaneous taxes.

I want to thank Senator Godfrey for his excellent explanation of this bill. I regret to say that, while speaking to Bill C-55 yesterday, I omitted, through a slip of memory, to thank Senator Frith for his excellent exposition of that bill. I very much appreciate his decision to move that that bill be referred to committee for further examination.

The bill before us, as Senator Godfrey pointed out, breaks down into three main areas, the first of which deals with the controversial items I have spoken of. It has the effect—and I will not go into this in detail—of imposing what is called a transportation tax, which is a tax on airline tickets purchased for the purpose of departure from Canadian airports to foreign airports. As honourable senators are aware, there is currently a tax in existence and paid, for the most part, by Canadians purchasing airline tickets at any airport. Foreigners leaving Canada, having purchased their tickets outside of Canada, were exempt from that tax. That exemption will no longer be in effect.

It is estimated that approximately 2.3 million travellers will be affected by this bill, 2 million of whom will be foreigners. The question arises, therefore, as to whether this particular amendment to the Excise Tax Act is to the benefit of Canada. We had evidence before a committee of this house that these particular provisions would have a disastrous impact on the Canadian tourist industry. Honourable senators are no doubt aware that our deficit in tourism is one of the most pressing problems facing Canada today. We are experiencing a galloping deficit in trade, in our balance of payments, and one of the important contributors to that deficit is the growing imbalance of the tourism account.

One wonders whether there was any consultation whatsoever between those in the government with responsibility for promoting tourism and those whose main interest is in getting more money into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, which would be Mr. Macdonald, the Minister of Finance, supported by the Minister of National Revenue. I looked for some suggestion that the minister had consulted his colleagues, but found none. In his presentation to the House of Commons he referred to consultation, but with no mention whatsoever of the effect on tourism. My own view is that the effect of this measure, while perhaps not being disastrous, will certainly be to the disadvantage of Canada. It seems incredible, at a time when the government is spending millions upon millions of dollars in promoting tourism into Canada, particularly tourism from the United States, that we should be setting up this kind of barrier.

It can be said, of course, that it amounts to only $8 on an airline ticket, and that is not all that much. However, there is evidence that the reason for the decrease in tourism in Canada, particularly from the United States, is the dissatisfaction on the part of tourists with this kind of red tape. There are other dissatisfactions with the way we treat tourists, but the evidence is there—and it was available to the minister—that it is exactly this type of thing that has contributed to our balance of payments deficit in respect of tourism. To my knowledge, no rationale has been given for it, except to say that because Canadians have to pay it, foreigners should have to pay it. That would make sense, I suppose, if it could be shown—and it has not been shown—that the $15 million in additional revenues that this tax will provide will not be more than wiped out by its effect on tourism. As I said earlier, the evidence is that some two million tourists coming into Canada will be adversely affected. This measure will certainly not increase their feeling that we are welcoming them to Canada.

The second general area into which these proposed amendments to the Excise Tax Act fall is that of taxes on gasoline and diesel revenues. It is neither a formal increase nor a decrease; it is actually an adjustment to change from one method of totalling taxes to another. It refers, of course, to the current 12 per cent federal sales tax, and that is to be changed to what is called a specific levy. That, again, was explained by Senator Godfrey. This tax will be paid by manufacturers, and the definition at this time is that an importer will be considered a manufacturer. Why that is so, I do not know. There has been objection to it.

The minister gave the reason for the amendment as being to correct administrative and compliance difficulties. I hope in due course we will be told exactly what those difficulties are. I hope we will be told—and it is essential to our consideration of the bill that we be told—how much money has been lost through the use of the former method of estimating this tax, and how much is expected to be gained as a result of the new method. Will there be a plus or minus effect on the balance of revenue as a result of this change? We are not told that, and we are not told that the purpose of the proposed change is to increase revenue. It is important that we know the effects.

To date, Revenue Canada, which is the collector of the tax, has allowed manufacturers to account for the taxes on all sales on the basis of the weighted average, which is a price determined periodically by Revenue Canada. The proposal in this bill is that the present determination as to how this tax should be estimated by Revenue Canada will now become a specific levy. The levies are set out relative to the various types of gasoline uses. The present determinants were put into effect in March, I believe, by Revenue Canada, and those are to become permanent.

The third area is what might generally be described as the closing of some loopholes, and the extending of relief of certain users of products. Perhaps the major item here provides for an increase in the volume of sales that may be eligible for exemption from the sales tax. The present level is $3,000, and the new level will be $10,000. The question has been raised as to whether this exemption is enough. It would appear to do no more than acknowledge the current inflation rate, and there has been the suggestion that it should be raised. Perhaps in committee, or in his speech in closing the debate, Senator Godfrey would indicate to us what the rationale is for the $10,000 limit.

For the benefit of honourable senators who have not been following the excise tax changes over the years, this means that certain industries to be designated by the minister—and I think this is an area of ministerial discretion that makes sense—can be designated for tax exemption, initially because they are in the crafts area, and have special attributes that would indicate it is in the public interest that they should be encouraged, and perhaps the best way to encourage them is to exempt them from this taxation. There is a further change. If I recall correctly, the $3,000 level, when it was available, was not available at the retail level, but now there is a proposed change to extend the sales area of exemption as well.

There are some other items that I refer to as coming largely under customs tariff classifications relief—such things as wheelchairs and other vehicles used for special non-commercial purposes. These are all set out in the act. Senator Godfrey has indicated the general scope of these, and perhaps in committee or before the debate on second reading has been completed there might be a little more detailed explanation as to what they are and the rationale for each one.

Other than that, honourable senators, I see no objection to the passage of this bill, but I would like to express the hope that the day will soon come when we will have before us bill No. 3 to amend the Excise Tax Act, and that it will substantially decrease this inordinately high level of excise duties, sales tax and other excise taxes in Canada, because this high level is one of the very serious constraints under which our economy is operating.

The last time I saw an estimate of the burden of this particular group of taxes—which, as I say, account for 21 per cent of our revenue—a comparison between Canada and the United States was indicated as being in the ratio of 25 to 15. As I think any Canadian manufacturer or any Canadian housewife will tell you, the imposition of these particular taxes, hidden taxes, is a substantial burden and a definite constraint on the development of the Canadian economy.

The sales tax, as I say, is a hidden tax. Suggestions have been made over and over again that this is one of the worst features of excise taxes and duties, and particularly the sales tax. Provincial sales taxes, of course, are levied on top of this tax. Because of an anomaly—and I think it is an anomaly—in the Constitution, they must be shown, and they are shown. When we make a purchase in Ontario or British Columbia—I think it is 7 per cent in Ontario, and 6 per cent in British Columbia—we know what the provincial sales tax is, but we do not know by looking at the price what the burden of this federal tax is. Whether it is practical to segregate this tax as one that must be shown in the consumer price, I do not know. It could be argued that there are many other components of price that should also be shown. But the fact that it is hidden has always seemed to me to be one of the best arguments for caution and care in imposing excise taxes of all kinds, particularly the sales tax. I hope that the time is not far off when we will have a bill before the Senate indicating a substantial reduction in the burden of excise taxes on the Canadian economy, Canadian business and Canadian individuals, particularly consumers.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with what Senator Grosart has just said about this particular bill, and also to draw the attention of the Senate, and especially of the Leader of the Government and the members of the committee who will be studying the bill, to what I believe is one additional important reason why the government would be wise to withdraw the provision relating to the excise tax being applied to airline tickets bought by people from outside Canada using Canadian airports.

In addition to the very valid points that Senator Grosart has made, members of this house are aware of the change made last year in United States income tax law that now prohibits Americans coming to Canada for conventions from deducting the expenses of such conventions for income tax purposes. The Montreal morning papers today gave some very disturbing figures to illustrate the impact this is having on conventions in Canada. They referred to the many convention cancellations in hotels in Montreal, and I am quite sure the same is true of other hotels across Canada. One example alone was a convention which would have required 3,000 rooms for five days having been cancelled as a result of this change in American income tax law. You can easily see what this is going to do to the hotel business in Canada. It also has a tremendous bearing on Canada's already serious balance of payments deficit.

If this bill goes through, in addition to an American citizen's no longer being able to deduct convention expenses for tax purposes, he is going to be required to pay an excise tax on his airline ticket if he lands at and takes off from an airport in this country. It seems to me that with the combination of those two things coming at this particular time when, as Senator Grosart has said, our tourist industry is away below normal and our balance of payments deficit extremely serious, it is short-sighted and counter-productive for Canada to apply a tax of this kind. I would therefore earnestly appeal to the sponsor of the bill and the Leader of the Government and the members of the committee who will be studying the bill to urge the government to withdraw at least this one provision of the bill until the tourist and convention situation significantly improves over what it is today.

● (1600)

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Godfrey speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would not like to pass an opinion at this time on whether the air transportation tax will have a disadvantageous effect on tourism. That is the kind of information which can be provided in committee, and I think the members of the committee could judge that more accurately for themselves.

I should like to comment on two statements of fact, however. I am not sure whether the figure was correct, but Senator Grosart at one point referred to the fact that the bill would affect two million foreigners, and then later on stated that it would affect two million tourists. Those two categories are not identical. I would be interested to know—and I am sure we could get the information in committee—roughly how many of the “two million” are businessmen who would not ordinarily be affected that much, and how many of the “two million” are tourists.

With respect to Senator Manning's statement, I should say that I have just returned from the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group meetings in Victoria, during which one of the subjects of discussion did concern the American bill, and I can say that it does not prevent conventions from taking place in Canada. What it does is limit the number of conventions to two a year, restrict the amount of money that can be spent in Canada, and permit deductions for economy fare only. On top of that, it is necessary for American taxpayers to prove they have been to a certain proportion of the convention meetings. Obviously, that has had a bad effect on our convention business, as has been reported in the newspapers. However, my own personal opinion—and again the committee can look into this for itself—is that the tax being imposed by this bill would be properly deductible for at least two conventions a year, and probably would not impose any particular burden on Americans or discourage them from coming to Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Godfrey moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL UNITY

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault, calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, let me discuss my own province first. What are the cultural aspirations of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador? Before attempting to answer that question I thought it a good idea to consult the dictionary to discover what one means when one talks about culture. The Oxford Dictionary gives a rather full definition as follows:

The training and refinement of mind, tastes and manners; the condition of being thus trained and refined; the intellectual side of civilization.

It seems that perhaps the intellectual side of civilization is overlooked during the rather shrill arguments which different sections of Canada have when disputing whose tastes and manners are the best tastes and manners. So far as we in Newfoundland are concerned, we are simply not interested in these arguments. We do not feel inferior to anyone, nor do we feel superior. Notwithstanding all the “Newfie” jokes, which we also enjoy, we have a nice comfortable feeling of complete equality with everyone.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cook: To quote from Gilbert and Sullivan, Newfoundlanders think that “when everybody's somebody, then no one's anybody.”

So far as our cultural aspirations are concerned, therefore, we will just go happily on in our own way, confident that when God made time he made plenty of it. We think, thus, that those who dispute so much will, together with the subject matter of their disputes, be forgotten in a few years.

The economic side of the situation is more complicated. When we joined Canada we had two successful paper mills, three mines, and the fisheries. We also had $40 million surplus in the bank, which does not seem much now, but was a lot in 1949.

Whatever differences one may have with Mr. Smallwood, even his worst enemies must give him credit for his almost superhuman effort to develop Newfoundland. Great effort and millions upon millions of dollars have been expended to obtain industries for the province. Those efforts and millions of dollars, I regret to say, have been spent almost in vain.

Nearly 30 years later in the island part of our province one mine has closed. That was the Bell Island Iron Ore Mine. We have gained one new small mine, the Advocate Asbestos Mine at Baie Verte. We have three medium-sized new industries, the Golden Eagle Oil Refinery at Holyrood, the shipbuilding yard at Marystown, and the Erko plant at Long Harbour which, however, I understand benefits to the tune of about $5 million a year because of the favourable power contract given it by the government to induce it to come to Newfoundland.

The brain-child of Mr. Sheehan, the Come-By-Chance oil refinery, might have succeeded had it been in operation for a few years before the great price increases, but the liner board mill should never have been constructed. This enterprise lost $21 million in 1974-75; $34 million in 1975-76; and $41 million in 1976-77. The Newfoundland government has now decided to close it down. There are a number of other small industries, such as a cement plant and a hardwood plant, to mention only two.

Through the initiative of the Smallwood government many Canadian and world-famous mining companies have gone over almost every inch of Newfoundland seeking minerals to develop, but they have had no success to date beyond the Advocate Mine.

Because of lack of soil, large-scale agriculture does not appear to be feasible.

The tourist industry, although unfortunately the season is short, should continue to grow.

Therefore, so far as the island of Newfoundland is concerned, notwithstanding every effort, we are, broadly and economically speaking, basically in the same position we were in 1949. This is not said to be critical of anyone. It is difficult to suggest what more could have been done. The entire island is littered with wrecks of enterprises which, with the gift of hindsight, seems to have been attempts to make water run up hill.

In the meantime, the $40 million has been spent, and a further staggering $2.094 billion has been borrowed and spent. The question must arise whether, despite what are doubtless good intentions, a large part of this huge sum was not borrowed for improvident purposes. Surely, further borrowings on a large scale, even if feasible, must nevertheless be irresponsible.

Notwithstanding this unhappy state of affairs, Newfoundlanders have benefited greatly from being part of Canada. When I view the great new university, the numerous magnificent schools, the hospitals, the public buildings, and the trans-Canada highway across our province, the advance is almost unbelievable. When I contemplate the numerous social benefits, family allowances, old age pensions, unemployment insurance, and so much else, I realize Newfoundland alone never, never could have been in a position to do so much and to give so much. The numerous shopping centres, all with their large supermarkets, are striking evidence of the impressive improvements in the standard of living of those who frequent them.

However, the Honourable William Doody, the Minister of Finance for Newfoundland, in his budget speech of Tuesday, April 28, 1977, summarized the situation clearly and truly when he said:

The major economic problem in Newfoundland is the absence of immediate and significant employment opportunities. At the heart of our unemployment problem is the absence of a strong economic base, and hence, an expensive dependence upon Government. This dependence upon Government is illustrated by the fact that about 45,000 people are employed directly by the Provincial, Federal and Municipal Governments.

As I have said, apart from tourism, which unfortunately has a very short season, unless the Newfoundland fisheries can be developed to employ more people and to produce more wealth, the economic future of the province is, to say the least, uncertain.

In the hydro and oil potential of Labrador lies our hope for the future.

In Labrador there are problems between the Governments of Canada and Newfoundland with regard to oil, and problems between the Government of Canada, the Government of Quebec and the Government of Newfoundland with regard to hydro. I feel sure that if the same problems existed between two or three private enterprises, mutual self-interest would have dictated a solution long before this.

The recent history of Labrador may be of interest. The vast land mass that is Labrador slumbered in silence until 1936. In that year, the Government of Newfoundland, which was then the Commission of Government, granted Labrador Mining and Exploration Company, a Canadian company, a concession over a large part of the territory. After the end of the war, as a result of the work done and information gained, there followed in successive stages the building of a railway, and the opening up of two very large iron ore mining operations—one by the Iron Ore Company and one by the Wabush Company. A similar concession was in due course granted by the Smallwood government to Brinco, and the Churchill Falls development was eventually completed. All this was done by private enterprise.

The current situation seems to be like a game of snakes and ladders. If private enterprise raises its head and starts at square one, what man-made odds does it face? Well, first it will be up against the Foreign Investment Review Act, and no matter how far along, it may have to go back to square one to sort out that problem. If it overcomes that, it will probably have trouble with the environmentalist, and so back to square one again. If it clears those two hurdles, somewhere along the way one or other of the provincial governments and Ottawa will have conflicting laws and regulations, so it returns to square one once more. Finally, if all else fails, it will be bang up against the tax collector, who will do everything to make sure that the gains will not justify the risk—so back to square one again. At this time the investor will publicly say, "To hell with it." If Sir Wilfrid Laurier could have foreseen the rise to power of the bureaucrat and the academic, I doubt very much if he would be of the opinion that the twentieth century belongs to Canada!

In the meantime, Labrador still sleeps, and its potential resource of hydro and oil waste into the sea or remain untapped at the bottom of the ocean. The prizes, if sufficient oil is discovered off Labrador, and if the hydro resources are fully developed, are very great and would accrue to the whole of Canada.

I have criticized the Government of Quebec for being too greedy over Labrador hydro, and I must in all fairness criticize the Government of Newfoundland if it is being too greedy over Labrador oil. No matter how strong a legal case Newfoundland has—and I believe it has a very strong case—Newfoundland should be satisfied with receiving the same treatment as the maritime provinces have agreed to accept. Newfoundland shares equally in all the benefits of being a member of the Canadian family, and we should accept the same burdens as other members. If, therefore, the province is holding out for more than the maritime provinces, that, in my opinion, is wrong.

So my answer to the question of what are the economic aspirations of Newfoundland and Labrador is to implore all governments concerned to cease and desist sitting on their hands, and to cooperate actively and urgently to develop the hydro and oil resources of Labrador. If they would get together, and if each would be a little more accommodating and generous one to the other, the gain would be to Canada.

Referring once again to the fisheries, I believe the federal Department of Fisheries has the interests of the Newfoundland fisheries very high on its list of priorities, and is doing a great deal to encourage and foster the industry. I thank the department for this, and trust that it will be encouraged to continue this help.

I regret the only possible conclusion, which is that unless some major breakthrough occurs in the search for and exploitation of oil, and the development of hydro in Labrador, and unless public expectations are severely curbed and public expenditure ruthlessly curtailed, Newfoundland will face financial collapse in a very few years.

Now a few words about the difficult questions which are on all our minds about the future of Canada herself. Fifty years ago next October I became an articulated law clerk to a very senior lawyer who taught me that the first thing to do when considering a problem is to find out what are your legal rights and duties before you think about what you will or will not do. Therefore I propose to consider the legal position should Canadians living in Quebec record a clear and decisive vote of want of confidence in Canadians living elsewhere in Canada, and thus express a desire to have a separate independent country.

If we assume that such a regrettable event does take place, we must further assume that all Canadians living in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada will respond and act as intelligent, sensible men and women, and will therefore respect the verdict of the people and accept in principle the ultimate division of our country.

If the foregoing is the sequence of events, what happens next? Let me assure honourable senators that there will be more to it than merely counting the votes for or against. Changing one's country is a good deal more complex and complicated than changing from one government made up of one political party to another government made up of an opposing political party. While it will not be the end of the world, there are many of us who think it would be terribly unwise and that no good would come of it. Indeed, both Canada and the new independent Quebec might suffer for a long time to come. But life would go on, and eventually things would straighten out.

The first big task facing both countries would be to sort themselves out. How would this be done? You may recall that when we in Newfoundland voted in favour of union with Canada, that vote was held in the summer of 1948 and we became Canadians on March 31, 1949. Between the date of the vote and the date of union, representatives from Canada and Newfoundland negotiated a treaty called the Terms of Union, which treaty was approved of by an amendment to the British North American Act. In the same way, should Quebec vote against remaining part of Canada, representatives from Canada and Quebec would have to negotiate a treaty which might be called the Terms of Separation, and which also, in its turn, must be approved of by an amendment to the British North America Act.

To negotiate the final terms would probably take a number of years. No doubt there would be provisional terms, and separation would take place in stages. However, if and when final separation did take place, the question of the economic relationship between the two countries would arise. The separatist government, having made life in Quebec as difficult as possible for what they term the English, and having finally broken up the country, would be completely insane to expect Canada to enter willingly into any mutual association, economic or otherwise.

While separation was taking place in stages, there would be commissions of both sides studying important questions such as the rights and protection of our native peoples, the rights of minorities, language rights, territorial problems, the division of the national assets and the national debt, and a host of other problems. A vital issue would be the fixing of a date by which people would have to elect what nationality they would be. However, until some treaty, provisional or otherwise, was settled and agreed upon, it is very important to remember that Quebec would still be Canadian, and Quebecers still Canadian citizens.

A very major problem to which both sides would have to address themselves would be the boundaries of the new state. A great deal of nonsense is being talked by the separatists, and part of this nonsense is that Quebec is indivisible. The correct position is that by the Treaty of Paris of 1763 all the land then occupied by Quebec became British North America. During the course of the years, British North America became Canada, and British citizens became Canadians. Therefore, as I have said, the assumption that Quebec is indivisible, but that Canada is divisible, is absolute nonsense. Heretofore Canadians outside Quebec have been too polite to argue this issue, and indeed up until now it was purely academic, and no good purpose was to be served by refuting it. The fact is that since the Treaty of Paris in 1763, Quebec has been first British and is now Canadian. Every bit of soil, every tree, every drop of water, every breath of air, and every man, woman and child in Quebec is Canadian. And never forget that all Canadians fought two world wars to keep Quebec, as well as the rest of Canada, free, independent and Canadian.

This is all a matter of fact and incontrovertible history. The land and people of Quebec, and the land and people of the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland are all Canadian. Like the young lady who couldn't be only a little bit pregnant, you can't be a little bit Canadian. You are all Canadian, or not Canadian at all. Therefore, the voters of Quebec are Canadians now, will be Canadians on the day of the plebiscite, and will remain Canadians until—in the event that the vote rejects Canada—the day royal assent is given to an amendment to the British North America Act passed by the Parliament of Canada.

How much and what parts of the land of Canada will be ceded to the new state of Quebec will be one of the first questions to be settled, and this will not be settled by Quebec alone. The only way Mr. Lévesque could attempt to do this would be to copy Mr. Smith of Rhodesia and proclaim an illegal unilateral declaration of independence, which I venture to suggest will not get him very far.

It is crystal clear that the Atlantic provinces cannot be placed in jeopardy to satisfy the ambitions of the separatists, and the terms of separation must therefore provide adequately and beyond any possibility of question for all necessary land, rail, water and air corridors and communications between the Atlantic provinces and the rest of Canada. At the very least, all avenues of access which now exist will have to continue to exist, without restriction or interference of any kind. Perhaps rights of way, roads and railways and so forth would remain completely Canadian, or become the subject matter of joint ownership. Any proposal to the contrary would be simply disregarded.

Not only is this the correct legal position, but even if the new state of Quebec has to be divided by these rights of access, the balance of simple justice and convenience is in favour of accommodating those living in the two parts into which Canada would be divided rather than the much smaller number who would be living in the two parts of Quebec.

There are only large areas of what is now Quebec which would be the subject of conflicting claims. It does not necessarily follow that the new state would be given all the land now forming the province of Quebec, and we have to remind ourselves that large areas of Canadian territory have been vested in Quebec since 1867. Furthermore, both Canada and the new state would have to be given equal rights to the St. Lawrence River.

Indeed, the final settlement of the question of where the boundaries of the new state would be may require the holding of further plebiscites to ascertain the wishes of people living in different areas of the province. If this should prove to be necessary, then we can surely assume that the citizens of the new independent state would also respond and act as intelligent, sensible men and women, and would therefore respect the verdict of non-separatists by accepting in principle that these areas form part of Canada.

To sum up, if Quebec separates, it will adversely affect all Canada.

However, there seems to be no valid reason to assume that if Quebec separates, Canada would cease to exist as a country. Nor is there any need to be too pessimistic about our future. Canada would still be a great country with a great future, while Quebec, I fear, would have a much more uncertain future on its own, and would have a somewhat lower standing of living. Her citizens would be rather fenced in as citizens of Quebec, and shut out from the rest of Canada of which they are now a part.

It is difficult to see what separation will give to Quebecers over and above what they now enjoy. In 1977, except for the government of René Lévesque, there is no government—I repeat, no government—in Canada, whether federal or provincial, which will not listen with sympathy to the legitimate, reasonable aspirations of any minority. The present Quebec government seeks to turn back the hands of the clock to before 1763 and deny, by legislation, a right vested in every child born in Quebec since 1763 and that is the right to be taught in his or her own language, be it French or English.

If the policy statements made from time to time by the Premier of Quebec and his ministers are examined closely, one is reminded of the nursery story about the emperor's wonderful suit of clothes. After all the silly bystanders had congratulated the emperor on his beautiful garments, one sensible little boy cried out, "The emperor is naked". In the same way, the Premier and his ministers use words, words and more words, and say nothing of substance.

The choice is for Quebec to make, but I feel strongly it is the duty of the Parliament of Canada to ensure that all the facts are placed before all the people. Canada should campaign just as hard and just as strongly for Confederation as the provincial government is going to campaign for separation, and ways must be found for all of us to express our concerns. We must keep reminding ourselves that Quebec's choice could be Canada's tragedy.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, June 8, 1977, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, might I ask the deputy leader if the granting of permission for committees to sit while the Senate is sitting, particularly on Wednesday next, means that the committees will meet at 3.30 p.m., or does it mean that the committees will meet at 2 p.m.?

Senator Langlois: I understand that the National Finance Committee is to meet at 2.30 p.m. on Wednesday next.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the Agriculture Committee is going to meet at 3 clock this afternoon.

Senator Langlois: The question was related to the committee meeting scheduled for next Wednesday.

Senator Flynn: Although your comment was not relevant, it was well put.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, this raises a question about changes in our normal arrangements for committee meetings. As honourable senators will recall, the Senate began Monday evening sittings this past week, at which time we sat for not quite three-quarters of an hour. The following day we sat for an hour and one-quarter, making a total of approximately two, two and one-quarter hours in two days of sittings.

I have no objection whatsoever to being called back any time when there is business, but I suggest that those who have the responsibility for the management of the Senate could at least make sure that there will be business before the Senate when it is sitting. That is not too difficult a task. Of the items on the order paper of Monday last, seven or eight were stood. I suggest that those whose responsibility it is to manage the affairs of the Senate speak to those in whose names the various items on the order paper stand to ensure that there is sufficient business before the Senate when it meets.

Calling the Senate back for Monday evening sittings disrupts a great part of the committee schedule. Honourable senators are aware that those of us on this side who are attempting to cover the various committee meetings are faced with an almost impossible task. That task is made that much more difficult when committees change previously arranged sittings.

We are all aware that committees call witnesses, sometimes a long time in advance, and it is not convenient for them to make these kinds of changes. But this sort of management seems to me to be unnecessarily disrupting to the business of the Senate.

Thirdly, we have the effect that if committees are sitting when the Senate is sitting we find ourselves dealing with important public business—perhaps the most important part of our responsibilities, which is bills that come before us for consideration—when there are very few senators here. On the last two occasions when we had that situation we came very close to not having a quorum. In one case we had an exact quorum, and in another case, for a considerable period of time we had only one senator more than the quorum. I suggest that these are aspects of our work that should be taken into more serious consideration than they appear to be. I know the problems and I know they are difficult to solve, but I would suggest that perhaps with more consultation, and with a little more pressure on some of us when we adjourn the debate on bills, that the work of the Senate in these three respects could be made much more efficient.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, last week when I announced that we were going to sit on Monday evenings until the end of June, which is the proposed date for the summer adjournment, I mentioned that the necessity of sitting on Monday evening was in order to enable committees to discharge their workload.

As far as the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is concerned, this committee has quite a heavy workload, and I am informed that not only will it sit on Wednesday afternoon but that it will likely sit on Wednesday evening. Another aspect of this matter is that I am not the person who decides which committee is going to sit on a particular day. We have, as honourable senators know, a co-ordinating committee headed by Senator Bourget, and I have never introduced a motion to allow a committee to sit while the Senate is sitting without first checking with Senator Bourget to ascertain that these meetings have been cleared with him. I received information this afternoon that the committee meetings scheduled for next week have all been cleared with the co-ordinating committee. I am sure that if Senator Bourget and his committee came to the conclusion to suggest that these committees should be allowed to sit while the house is sitting next week, it was because there were good reasons to do so.

I am in the hands of the house, of course, but I have to follow the advice coming from the co-ordinating committee which this house decided, by common agreement between the two leaders last year, to establish. My responsibility ends there. But I am very much convinced, looking at what is on the Orders of the Day in this chamber at the present time, and considering what is likely to come to us from the other place next week, that we will have quite a heavy workload both in this house and in committee during the coming week.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I want to make a comment. I was not aware that the deputy leader had definitely announced that we would sit every Monday night from now until the end of the session. My impression was that this was indicated but not stated. I may be wrong in that, and I am subject to correction. If that is so, then it would seem to me that there should be some rescheduling of committee meetings. On the last occasion, for example, no committee sat on Tuesday morning. If we are going to be here on Monday night, then surely some of these committees that are asking to sit on Wednesday afternoon might find it convenient to sit on Tuesday morning.

I am merely suggesting that if we now have a definite rule that we are sitting every Monday night from now on, there might possibly be some rescheduling of committees to avoid some of these problems that I have raised.

Senator Bourget: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Grosart for his remarks. I think he is quite right. But he knows personally, and so does the Leader of the Opposition, that I am taking good care trying to organize the meetings of the committees so as to give a chance to the opposition because they are so few in number, and I realize that.

I should also like to take this opportunity to ask for the cooperation of all committee chairmen. This morning one committee sat without my permission, and I do not think that is fair. As I have said, I try to accommodate the committee chairmen, but honourable senators will realize that I cannot perform miracles. In the past we sat four half days or five half days and had eight or ten committee meetings. I wish to take this opportunity to ask for the cooperation of all committee chairmen, particularly at the end of the session when so many bills are coming from the other place. I repeat, I try to cooperate, but surely I can expect all the chairmen to cooperate with me.

Last night Senator Argue organized a committee meeting for this morning. He called the Director of the Committees Branch and told him he was going to sit this morning, without taking into account that there were two other committees sitting. As far as I am concerned, and as long as I am chairman of the coordinating committee, I won't let that happen again. I want to inform all chairmen that, as Senator Argue knows, I am always ready to cooperate but I hope it is not a one-way street.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I think I should explain what happened. Yesterday afternoon we were assured, when we were exploring the possibility of getting permission to meet while the Senate was sitting, that little was before the house, and that it was almost a pro forma thing that we would be out of the Senate by 3.30. However, points of order were raised and a long discussion took place. Witnesses had come here from Lethbridge, Alberta, to appear before our committee. They were important witnesses who came here as a result of the hearings we had in Alberta, but in the circumstances we did not get a chance to start the meeting until 4.30 or later. At the meeting the witnesses did not complete their testimony. It was not my suggestion; it was the suggestion of members of the committee that we should have a chance to complete hearing the important evidence of these people from Lethbridge, who had cooled their heels outside waiting for the Senate to rise. A motion was passed unanimously asking that the committee meet at 10.30 this morning.

I did not know Senator Bourget was finding it difficult. I knew the Hansard reporters were complaining. I felt that if our committee was important enough to undertake this inquiry, then somehow or another reporting procedures might be arranged. I think this is an important committee; I think it is doing important work. Under the circumstances I have no apology for the action that was taken. I would be happy to confer with Senator Bourget to try to make his life as easy as possible. I hope he will also make our lives as easy as possible.

Senator Bourget: I have no apology to make in the circumstances either. Senator Argue knows our rules very well, which are that the committees which have priority are those dealing with legislation. He well knows that it is difficult for three committees to sit at the same time. All chairmen have been told that not more than one committee should sit while the Senate is sitting, and also that not more than two committees should sit at the same time. You can ask the reporters and the interpreters what trouble they have when we are informed of a committee sitting at the very last minute. Even if a recording tape is utilized, I have been told of the difficulties encountered by reporters and amanuenses in transcribing from such tapes. I would therefore, while I try to forget this situation, like to remind all committee chairmen to endeavour to cooperate. Otherwise, Mr. Leader, I may have to relinquish this position and have someone else take over. I am trying to do my best and I believe that all committee chairmen would agree that on each and every occasion I have endeavoured to accommodate them, particularly Senator Argue. So I would like to receive the same treatment on their part.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we all appreciate the fine work of Senator Bourget and the importance of cooperating with him. I serve notice that if he resigns his position of committee co-ordinator he will be re-appointed immediately.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Deputy Leader of the Government a question. Has any consideration been given to having the Senate sit on Tuesday evening rather than Tuesday afternoon in those weeks when the Senate resumes its sittings on Monday evening? There would be no conflict with the sitting of the house and the committees could use the full day of Tuesday for its meetings. This plan might work better than anything we have tried. I don't believe we have tried this before.

Senator Langlois: Senator Molson is one jump ahead of me. When I move the adjournment motion later on this day I will state that we intend to sit on Tuesday evenings and leave the mornings and afternoons of that day free for committee meetings.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, since the motion to allow the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to sit while the Senate is sitting next Wednesday is still before us, I believe the house is entitled to an explanation. The committee on National Finance is allowed to sit on Tuesday and Thursday of every second week, and on Wednesday after the Senate rises. We have a deadline approaching in connection with the estimates, and so we must have hearings because they must be dealt with before June 15. We tried to get this Wednesday after the Senate rose, having sat on Tuesday and Thursday of this week, but the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee already had that slot. We therefore applied for next week.

It then transpired that the Senate will sit on Monday of next week. So we tried to get Tuesday morning or Tuesday afternoon. However, a sufficient number of committees are already scheduled for then, and the conflict of timing between those committees and the committee on National Finance is such that we cannot sit on Tuesday morning or Tuesday afternoon. We are not allowed to sit on Thursday of that week because that time is reserved for the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, with which we alternate. So the only sitting date available to the National Finance Committee to consider the estimates is next Wednesday. The following week we will probably meet on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. It is for that reason that we are making this request, knowing that it is a difficult request for the Senate to grant.

I should also like to say that I hope Senator Bourget will not relinquish his post, because I have found him to be a most reasonable and accommodating person with whom to work.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, 8th June, 1977, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Langlois: Before the question is put, I should like to add that this committee will be sitting in camera, so that no reporting staff will be required.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, June 6, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to make the usual statement in explanation of this motion. It will be necessary for the Senate to sit on Monday evening next week in order to deal with the work now before our standing committees, the legislation now before the Senate and expected legislation from the other place. We are planning to have the Senate sit on Tuesday evening rather than in the afternoon so that Tuesday morning and afternoon may be devoted to committee work.

On Monday evening Senator Connolly will move second reading of Bill C-47, to amend the Export Development Act, and Senator McIlraith will move second reading of Bill C-50, to amend the Judges Act and other acts in respect of judicial matters. We will continue the debate on Senator Perrault's inquiry with respect to the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada, and deal with other matters on the order paper. It is expected that Bill C-25, the Canadian Human Rights Bill, will pass the Commons today and we will have it for next week. In addition, Bills C-3, C-8 and C-12 are very likely to reach us early next week.

For the information of honourable senators, Bill C-3 is a bill to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, Bill C-8 is a bill to amend the Financial Administration Act and to repeal the Satisfied Securities Act, and Bill C-12 is a bill to implement an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany and conventions between Canada and Morocco, Canada and Pakistan, Canada and Singapore, Canada and the Philippines, Canada and the Dominican Republic, and Canada and Switzerland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

With regard to the committee's schedule for next week, so far as can be ascertained at this time, on Tuesday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider Bill C-54, to amend the Excise Tax Act (No. 2). Also at 9.30 a.m. there will be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill C-9, the James Bay Agreement Act. This committee will continue with Bill C-9 in the afternoon at 2.30 p.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has also arranged to meet at 2.30 p.m. on Canada-United States relations.

On Wednesday at 9.30 a.m. there will be a meeting of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on Bill S-4, when the committee will hear witnesses from various oil companies. The committee is also planning a meeting in camera in the afternoon at 2.30 on its draft report on the white paper on banking legislation. The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has been given permission by the Senate to hold a meeting at 2.30 p.m. on the main estimates for 1977-78. The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet to hear witnesses in connection with its inquiry into the beef industry. The meeting will be at 3.30 p.m. or when the Senate rises. Also, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet on Bill C-41, the Maritime Code Bill, when the Senate rises.

On Thursday morning the Foreign Affairs Committee will again meet on Canada-United States relations at 9.30 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science has set down a meeting for 11 a.m., but details of that meeting have not yet been settled.

As honourable senators are aware, this committee list is subject to change, and it is likely that additions will be made before we resume our sittings next week.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GREAT LAKES WATER QUALITY AGREEMENT—QUESTION

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I have a question to ask of the Leader of the Opposition, but because of the wide implications of the answer—

An Hon. Senator: You mean the Leader of the Government.

Senator Robichaud: —I certainly do not expect an answer this afternoon. I should have said that I had a question to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sorry. If I ask questions of the Leader of the Opposition, it is outside this chamber.

On April 15, 1972, the Governments of Canada and the United States signed a Great Lakes water quality agreement whereby the two countries agreed that programs and other measures to achieve the accepted water quality objectives for the lakes would be either completed or in the process of implementation by December 31, 1975. The two governments also agreed to conduct a comprehensive review of the operation and effectiveness of the agreement during the fifth year after its coming into force. I therefore ask:

1. Have the two governments lived up to their commitments in relationship to the December 31, 1975 date?
2. Will the two governments conduct a comprehensive review of the agreement, and, if so, what procedures are to be followed in order to accomplish this?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question asked by Senator Robichaud is very important, particularly in view of the distinguished senator's former position with the International Joint Commission. I think it may be of some value to members of this chamber to have a rather full statement prepared in reply to that question, a statement which I would propose to deliver in the very near future.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HELSINKI AGREEMENT—CUSTOMS DUTY ON GIFTS TO U.S.S.R.— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to reply to a question asked by Senator Thompson on May 25 regarding the Helsinki Agreement and its relation to customs duty on gifts to the U.S.S.R. The question was:

Since the signing of the Helsinki Agreement, has the customs duty levied by the Soviet Union on gifts sent by citizens of Canada to relatives in the Soviet Union increased or decreased? If so, by what percentage?

The answer to this question is as follows:

In the spring of 1976 the Soviet Union announced substantial increases in the customs duties levied on gifts sent to the U.S.S.R. This increase has varied, depending upon the item. The range, for the most part, has been from 100 per cent to 300 per cent.

ASSISTANCE TO HAITI—QUESTION

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government about the disastrous situation in Haiti resulting from a shortage of food and drinkable water. The newspaper La Presse is now reporting daily on the situation in a series of articles, and because of certain conflicting reports I should like to know from the government leader:

1. Was a request for help recently addressed by the Government of Haiti to the Government of Canada?
2. Do we have presently in Haiti Canadian officials who could report to the government about the seriousness of the situation?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice.

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, perhaps you would permit me to ask a further question of the government leader on the same subject matter.

My question is:

- (1) How much does the federal government give in aid to Haiti annually, through CIDA or any of the other international corporations?
- (2) How and to whom is this money paid in Haiti?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SALARY OF FORMER EMPLOYEE—FURTHER QUESTION

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, I have a question that takes me back to May 30 on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation issue. I do not want to embarrass the Leader of the Government by any means, but I do want him to understand that he did say on that date, and I quote from the Debates of the Senate:

Certainly, I can convey to the appropriate authorities the dissatisfaction on the part of certain senators with the reply to the question posed about the former CBC entertainer—

My question is:

(1) Has this dissatisfaction been conveyed to these appropriate authorities?

(2) Who are the appropriate authorities?

Honourable senators, it is a matter of principle with me, as an individual senator, that no crown corporation should have the audacity to give the kind of reply that was given in the past and reported here by the Leader of the Government. The answer was a blatant denial of the prerogatives of this institution. Frankly, I really hope that this is not taken as a threat, but if the Senate collectively cannot obtain that kind of reply then I assure you that as an individual citizen of this country I will move to the appropriate court with the appropriate jurisdiction and demand that information.

So I would ask the Leader of the Government if he could possibly give us some definitive reply by Monday night next.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not intend to meet any specific deadlines in answer to any question; indeed, it would be irresponsible of me to make that kind of commitment.

Senator Grosart: He made a speech.

Senator Perrault: Secondly, the honourable senator has asked a great range of questions involving a series of subjects. They were more in the form of a statement or speech than in the form of questions. However, I shall do my best to review the questions he has asked and attempt to obtain answers to them.

As far as the questions with respect to Haiti are concerned, I hope they can be dealt with as part of the reply to the earlier questions asked with respect to Haiti.

As far as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is concerned, the reply given the other day is the standard form of reply which the corporation has employed with respect to questions posed not only in this chamber but in the other place, for a number of years. Indeed, the response of the CBC to questions was raised recently, I understand, during a series of hearings before one of the committees in the other place. I understand that members there have similarly requested fuller information from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

But, as I said at the outset, honourable senators, it is simply impossible for me to meet any deadlines for responses to questions; indeed, I do not intend to do so.

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, I do not intend to put the Leader of the Government on the spot with regard to Haiti and the deadline for Monday. But I think that this thing has been hashed over for too long, and in my view a crown corporation is accountable to us as part of the parliamentary process, a principle that I shall persist on emphasizing as long as I have the privilege of being a member of this Senate.

Senator Grosart: Order, order.

Senator Ewasew: I think we should have an answer. I hope that I will have support from most of the senators in the house.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—THIRD READING

Senator Frith moved the third reading of Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SOLAR ENERGY APPLICATION BILL

MOTION TO REFER BILL TO COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Austin that Bill C-309, respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and on the motion in amendment thereto of Senator Flynn that the motion be amended by striking out the words "Banking, Trade and Commerce" and substituting therefor the words "Health, Welfare and Science."

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I moved the adjournment of this debate yesterday for the specific purpose, first of all, of examining further the amendment moved to the motion by Senator Flynn, and, secondly, of attempting to relate some remarks that had been made in this ongoing debate as to the disposition of this bill to the situation in which we are now in relation to the passage of the bill.

The impression I have now of the situation raised by Senator Flynn is that unquestionably there seems to be a conflict in our rules. I refer to rule 67(1)(k)(vii) which gives the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee jurisdiction in the area of "natural resources and mines." I would have to admit at once that resources would come under the subject matter of the bill since it deals with solar energy as an energy resource. On the other hand, the very next paragraph of the rule, 67(1)(l), gives the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science jurisdiction in respect of matters relating to "health, welfare and science generally," including a list of specific things.

I think I can explain what has happened here in the development of this conflict. The Senate decided some years ago to add science to the jurisdiction of the Health and Welfare Committee, chaired by Senator Carter. The impression I now have is that at that time the Rules Committee did not examine the implications of this addition carefully enough, because if a bill such as this were to be referred to that committee—and that was the intention—then our position would be that of dealing with a bill concerning scientific research which ought, therefore, to come under the jurisdiction of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee.

Senator McElman: Would the honourable senator permit me to intervene on a point of order? I do not wish to interrupt him, but I must inform the Senate that at this moment the proceedings of this house are being broadcast in the corridors. Perhaps instructions could be issued by the Speaker to have it cease forthwith, since there is no permission for it. There are loudspeakers just outside the door of the chamber. Those speakers are on, and the proceedings of the house are currently being broadcast to the central hallway of the building.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would ask the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to see to the matter immediately.

Senator McElman: I ask Senator Grosart to pardon me for having interrupted his speech.

Senator Perrault: It may be that he wanted it broadcast.

Senator Grosart: I was not at all sure whether the matter Senator McElman was referring to was a direct broadcast or an indirect broadcast. I presumed it was the latter.

As I was saying, there is this conflict, and whether it is a strict point-of-order decision, a legal decision or a constitutional decision, I think it could quite properly go either way. Therefore, when a choice has to be made, it would seem to me that the appropriate way to proceed is to ask what the common sense of the matter is, and in that I agree with the amendment moved by Senator Flynn. If a bill can be referred to either of two committees, common sense would indicate that if it deals with scientific research, the setting up of a scientific research institution, then it should go to the committee which is charged with all matters relating to science. The wording is quite clear:

—bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to health, welfare and science generally—

That is all I have to say on that particular aspect. It will, of course, be for the Senate to decide on the amendment and, if it does not carry, on the main motion.

We are then still dealing with the main motion, which concerns the disposition of this bill. It has not yet been decided by the Senate that it is to go to a committee. We are still in that area of discussion, and it is in that area that I feel it is quite relevant to make some remarks about the background of the amendment before us.

Briefly, the bill came to us, and was introduced at the second reading stage by Senator Austin. He was a bit confused at the time, because he seemed to think—in fact he made the statement—that the Senate had agreed unanimously to give it second reading. It had not at that point. We were debating his motion that it be read the second time. I think it was this kind of confusion, and other confusions, which may have had something to do with the heat which was engendered. Statements were made which were not conducive to quiet, calm, sober reflection on the matter. I will not refer to all of those, because that is past history and we have made our decision, but I do find it necessary to make reference to certain remarks.

I am sorry the senator to whom I am about to refer has left the chamber—and perhaps that was because of the “broadcasting” taking place a moment ago. I refer, of course, to Senator Robichaud and his remarks. Yesterday I was on the brink of rising on a point of privilege, but refrained from doing so until I could reflect on the matter. After reflecting calmly, I feel I have a duty to protest some remarks which were made—and this is not merely on my own account, as I will point out in a moment.

Honourable senators are aware that there was a difference of opinion in the Senate on several matters, particularly on the principle of the bill. Some senators took a stand in respect of a principle about the principle. We argued our case as well as we could. In those circumstances, I was amazed to hear Senator Robichaud make comments to the effect that I and others had wasted the time of the Senate; that he had never witnessed such an “exercise in futility”; that we had been quarreling over an amendment which could have the effect of delaying the eventual passage of the bill. Well, as was pointed out clearly, the amendment did not have that effect. He objected to having to stand and take up a few minutes of time to say how frustrated he was by the discussion. Finally, he referred to it as “waste as is being wasted today in this debate on a simple matter of procedure.”

I merely want to say that it was not a matter of procedure as far as I or my colleagues were concerned. It was a matter of principle. Whether we were right or wrong is not the point. I should like the senator to read my comment that it was also a matter of principle to nine of his colleagues. When the matter came to a vote and was negatived, 21 senators found themselves in the position of being subjected to this type of accusation as to our motivations and the exercise of our right to stand in the Senate and fight as hard as we can, and as long as we can, for a principle in which we believe.

I regret that the honourable senator is not present. I hope he will read my remarks, reflect on them, and decide what response he feels should be made.

We still have the question before us as to which committee should consider this bill. I appreciate the fact that there are two possibilities, and should indicate that I support the amendment moved by Senator Flynn. If it comes to a vote, I will vote in favour of that amendment.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I shall endeavour to limit my comments to that portion of the honourable senator's remarks which deal with the referral of this bill to a particular committee.

I am inclined to agree that this measure could be referred to any committee. Rule 67 is quite clear in that respect. It merely sets out the main functions of committees. Only one of the committee listed under rule 67 can, of its own initiative, study a matter. All the other committees can exercise their functions only if a motion to that effect is adopted by the Senate, and such motions, to my mind, can vary the function listed for the individual committees in rule 67.

My advice was sought on the motion to refer the bill to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. Having in mind the widespread criticism which surfaced during the course of debate on the motion for second reading respecting the deficiencies in the wording of the bill as now drafted, my advice was that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, given the make-up of that committee, was much better equipped to deal with the bill than the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. I am a member of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, and I am sure that that committee is not as equipped as is the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to deal with a bill which needs extensive revision in terms of its wording before it can pass on third reading. For that reason, I suggested to the sponsor that it be referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

In arriving at my decision, I took into consideration the fact that that committee has quite a workload. However, I have been informed that the chairman and members are ready to tackle this additional task, and they are ready to do so in a speedy manner, as they have always dealt with the many measures which have been referred to them in the past.

I concede that the suggestion of my honourable friend makes sense. The bill no doubt could be referred to the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, or any other committee, on a motion in this house. However, having regard to the expertise of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and the deficiencies which must be corrected in the wording of this bill before it is capable of passing on third reading, it is my submission that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is better equipped than any other committee of this house to deal with it.

Senator Grosart: With leave, honourable senators, I should like to make a brief comment. Without discussing the principle, I would not want to be put in the position of acceding to the suggestion that Senator Carter's committee, the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, is not fully and completely competent to deal with a bill respecting scientific research.

Senator Langlois: I did not go that far.

Senator Grosart: I merely make that comment.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL UNITY

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave, I yield to Senator Olson.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Horace Andrew Olson: Honourable senators, in rising for the first time in this chamber, I should like to express my appreciation to all honourable senators who wrote to me wishing me welcome and well in my career in this chamber. I should also like to express my appreciation to the many honourable senators and members of the staff who have been very kind and generous in offering me assistance in familiarizing myself with the mechanics, if you like, of this chamber, and the supporting staff and services. It has been an exceptionally delightful experience for me.

I intend to be very brief on my first intervention in the Senate and my participation in the debate on meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada. I express the hope that this Senate, with all its competent members, will be involved and will indeed assist in relieving some of the tensions that have grown up between the regions of Canada.

Honourable senators, I agree with most of what has been said so far in the debate. In fact, I agree with almost all of it. I also find myself in a large measure of agreement with speeches that have been made on this subject outside this chamber. But, I have to add that I do not believe that recognition of linguistic and cultural differences, and so on, will, by itself, solve some of the regional tensions and difficulties that have built up in Canada very recently and, indeed, farther back in our history. I believe that this chamber as well as its committee, and the facilities we have at our disposal, can, in fact, make a tangible contribution to the resolution of economic and other difficulties between the regions.

For example, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture has been meeting rather intensively during the past few days and had, I understand, quite a number of meetings before I became a member of this house. This committee, by its inquiry into the beef industry,—is going to make a major and significant contribution to relieving some of these tensions. Let me explain briefly why I think that will happen. Many of the beef producers on the prairies have been suffering severe economic losses for about three years in trying to produce beef for the Canadian market. At the same time they know that there is something wrong, but they do not know what it is, in the marketing structure. They believe that whatever it is that is wrong happens in the wholesale trade in places like Montreal, in particular, and Toronto. So far as this inquiry is concerned—and I do not know whether it is against the rules to refer to an inquiry that is going on—the committee has not yet been able to identify or pinpoint what it is that is wrong in the beef marketing structure, although I think we are getting closer and closer to it.

Now, if that can be identified and some remedial action can be taken, I suggest to you, honourable senators, that most of the people of Alberta and the people involved in the beef production industry are going to have a very much better feeling toward another part of Canada where the major market for their beef is located, and that is Montreal. I hope we will give sufficient attention to the work of this committee to, first of all, diagnose and identify the problem, and then follow through by making some fair and just recommendations that will solve the problem.

That is only one aspect, honourable senators, and there are two other matters that I know of—economic matters—that this house and its committees can become involved in, and which have been studied very intensively recently. One is the subject matter of the study carried out by the Hall Commission. We know that this commission is going to be disbanded fairly soon, so I hope that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will pick up some of the recommendations that have been made by Mr. Justice Hall and his commission and follow them through to the point where we can see some tangible remedial action taken in respect of the problems that have been studied. As I have said, that commission is going to be disbanded, so it will just not be there any more to do its own follow-up work.

The second economic matter is the one that has been studied recently by the Economic Council of Canada, as a result of which the Council published a book about regional differences entitled, I think, Regional Disparity and Living Together. In that book they point out that there is, in their opinion, a legitimate grievance from the prairies with respect to transportation costs, and, indeed, the suppression of secondary industry in that part of Canada because of transportation facilities and their costs.

Once again, honourable senators, since the studies are fresh and up-to-date, and these are all conditions that exist in 1977, I hope that this house will take some action and follow through so that very sound and hard recommendations for the correction of these grievances might be made to the government. I really believe that the Transport and Communications Committee can make a very useful contribution to Canadian unity by picking up these questions and making sure that follow-up action is taken.

I need hardly repeat it to honourable senators who have been here for a long time, but it was my experience when I was in the other place, and, indeed, when I was in the ministry, that some of the inquiries undertaken by the Senate were far more useful in practical terms to the people of Canada than many of the royal commissions that were set up from time to time. In the first place, they were a great deal less expensive, because this chamber goes on week after week and year after year at reasonably close to the same cost. Yet we have had some royal commissions that cost several millions of dollars. But that is not the most important part. The most important part is that the Senate is an ongoing body that can follow matters up, and see whether or not its recommendations are accepted by the government of the day. If they are not, then the Senate can study them further, amend them and bring them up-to-date, and send them to the government again. My experience has been that the committees that have been established by this chamber to conduct specific inquiries—I could name a number of them, but I am sure that is not necessary—have been extremely successful.

As I said at the outset, I am not going to take up very much more time because I hope we shall have further discussions when we reach the stage where we are going to do something more specific with respect to the inquiry before us. However, I do have one other point to make before resuming my seat.

I hope that we in this chamber, as we travel around the country, will endeavour to do something to discourage the use of regional differences for temporary partisan gain. It is my belief, I hasten to say, that western politicians are as guilty in this respect as those from any other part of the country. Although it may not appear to be very damaging to the overall strength and unity of Canada immediately, when people, especially local and provincial leaders, constantly refer to the differences between regions in an endeavour to exploit them for some temporary political gain, I suggest there is cumulative damage to the unity of the country. I hope that we would try to discourage both federal and provincial politicians from doing that in the future, and cause them to realize that even in Canada it is possible to push these things to the point at which they become dangerous to the stability of our country.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I wish to say that I hope that the Senate, with its facilities, committees and all the support available to it, will be used positively and in tangible ways to preserve the unity of this country. I say again that it is my experience that this has been done by this chamber on a number of occasions in the past, and we should, therefore, not hesitate to use these facilities for this purpose in the future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to ask Senator Olson a question?

Senator, first allow me to congratulate you on your speech, which I found very well pointed and particularly effective because of your well known experience in western and agricultural affairs. That is the reason I wish to ask you this question.

Perhaps you have not had a chance yet to see it, but on my desk yesterday was a statement from the Minister of Transport with respect to at least a substantial implementation, as he thought, of the recommendations of the Hall Commission report relating to rail networks, I believe, and maintenance until the year 2000, and some extension. I, and perhaps other senators, would be interested to hear your comments as to whether that is or is not a step in the right direction, and how you would assess that statement in relation to the very questions you raised with respect to the Hall Commission report.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I noticed, and, as a matter of fact, was advised more than a week ago that the Honourable the Minister of Transport was, in fact, going to make some announcements. He intended to do something else also—to meet in Regina with some of the agricultural leaders in western Canada so that they could proceed as rapidly as possible to achieve some positive results related to Mr. Justice Hall's recommendations. In my opinion, the two announcements he made with respect to the prairie rail authority and putting certain lines into the permanent network to the year 2000 are very positive. They are timely, and I am sure that they will be well received in western Canada, the affected area.

However, I would suggest that there are a large number of other recommendations contained in Mr. Justice Hall's report which cannot be implemented so quickly. It will take some time to study the administrative requirements and the details related thereto. They also require a number of consultations to be carried on between the railways and other businesses and cooperatives which are involved in the grain industry. I would hope—and I made reference to this—that this house and its Transport and Communications Committee will take that report under advisement and, perhaps, be helpful in calling together those who would have to be involved in giving administrative effect to some of the other recommendations.

Inasmuch as this house and its committees are ongoing bodies, it does not matter whether it takes three months or three years—which will probably be the case with respect to some of Mr. Justice Hall's recommendations—for this house to follow through to the point at which something positive can be done.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Carter, debate adjourned.

VISIT OF DELEGATION OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS TO MEXICO, MARCH 21 TO 28, 1977—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Molgat, calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of a delegation of Canadian Parliamentarians to Mexico, from 21st to 28th March, 1977.—(Honourable Senator Bélisle).

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I am informed that our distinguished colleague from Toronto would like to speak on an important subject before next week's conference in Helsinki. I would ask that this order stand so that Senator Thompson may proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

PARLIAMENTARY ASSEMBLY OF THE COUNCIL OF EUROPE

TWENTY-NINTH ORDINARY SESSION, STRASBOURG, FRANCE,
APRIL 25 TO 29, 1977

Hon. Andrew Thompson rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the First Part of the Twenty-ninth Ordinary Session of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, held in Strasbourg, France, from 25th to 29th April, 1977, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, first, I would like to thank Senator Bélisle for his courtesy. I appreciate very much the fact that he has given me the opportunity to speak at this time.

I had the privilege, honourable senators, to be included in the Canadian delegation to the Twenty-ninth Ordinary Session of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe in Strasbourg. Our small Canadian delegation consisted of two members of the House of Commons, Mr. Breau and Mr. Mitges, and myself. Mr. Breau spoke eloquently and ably on behalf of the delegation during the session. As other senators know, the most important and productive aspect of these international conferences is the informal sessions which take place among delegates, and which provide the opportunity to converse about Canada and the countries of other delegates. I do not intend to single out any of the many social evenings which were arranged for the delegates, but I would be remiss if I did not at least refer to the Consul General, Mr. Gauvin, who was most cordial and helpful in arranging meetings for the delegation. He was also well informed about European events.

I wish also to thank Mr. Eric Laverick, who accompanied the delegation and assisted us in a most conscientious and able way.

The purpose of this particular session of the Council was to deal primarily with the results of the implementation of the Helsinki Act.

When I arrived in Strasbourg one of the delegates asked me, "Why are you, a Canadian, so eager to come over here when you are almost 4,000 miles away from Strasbourg?" I pointed out to him that most Canadians—and this is true, I think, of every member of this chamber, except Senator Adams and Senator Williams—have roots in Europe, and that it is vital to Canadian interests that this link with Europe be maintained. I pointed out also that Canada is the home of many people who came as refugees from Communist regimes. I am sure that most senators, as they have passed through the airports of Canada, have experienced deep sympathy and emotion on seeing some small group or family waiting, with apprehension and concern on their faces, for some loved one to arrive, possibly after long bureaucratic delays, from one of the Communist countries. You see them suddenly move forward and cluster around the new arrival, and there will be an unabashed flow of tears as they welcome yet another family member to Canada. This stream of refugees has been coming into Canada from the wretched, sordid conditions that exist under the Communists, who want only to impose their lifestyle and government throughout the world.

In 1968, as some senators may recall, I flew to Austria to help bring back the Czechoslovakian refugees, of which, at that time, Canada accepted something like 12,000. I remember flying back in the plane with a group of these people and seeing their anxiety and fear and concern, particularly for their children, and then their relief when they arrived in Canada and experienced the extraordinary welcome that they received from Canadians.

In 1956, when we saw the brutality of the invasion of Hungary, I was also working with refugees under the Honourable Jack Pickersgill, and I remember being on the Red Cross committee headed by the late Senator Thorvaldson. At that time we dealt with almost 40,000 refugees who had crawled through barbed wire to get away from the persecutions of the Communist regime, and who at length arrived in Canada and became integrated into our society.

I remember going on a Canadian Club tour across Canada at the time. This was a tough economic period for us, and there was concern about the acceptance by Canadians of such a large group of refugees into our economy. However, I was thrilled, as I have always been, by the warmth and generosity of small communities all across Canada who did everything they could to help these refugees to adapt and become integrated into our national life.

I told the delegate who asked me the question I mentioned a moment ago that I had a very personal reason for my deep interest in the reunification of families, which is one aspect of the Helsinki Act, and this interest exists because of someone I love and respect very deeply. He is a man who is now 79. I look at most of you, honourable senators, and in background this gentleman would be very similar to yourselves. He was a lawyer, a man interested particularly in labour legislation, who worked in a small country on a constitutional conference which was held for the purpose of changing its constitution. He was an author, and is a gentle, quiet, sensitive person. He is my father-in-law.

What was his crime? He had already been imprisoned by the Nazis for a year in solitary confinement, and when the Communists came he had to disrupt his whole life again and risk fleeing with his young family, consisting of his wife, my wife and her sister, across 200 miles of the Baltic Sea, in order to get to Sweden. He was lucky that he was able to escape. On the night of June 14, 1941, when he left his townhouse and went out to the country to arrange to leave, the Communists carried out a massive deportation in freight cars of the people they particularly wanted to deport, to torture, to put in jails, to send to concentration camps, namely, the members of Parliament, the leaders and intelligentsia of that small democratic country.

Senator Yuzik has spoken of the fact that of the Ukrainians in Mordovia more have been deported than are being born. It is difficult to imagine the enormity of the atrocities which the Communist system has inflicted on the peoples of the world. In the little country of Esthonia, with which I am acquainted, there were 59,000 deported in the first year after the Communists took over. So I had a personal and deep interest in attending this conference, the purpose of which was to examine the results of the implementation of the Helsinki Accord.

May I just give some short background information about the conference. There are many European parliamentary organizations, and so perhaps I should clarify the confusion that sometimes exists between the Council of Europe and the European Parliament. Both of these bodies convene in Strasbourg. The European Parliament, as senators know, is composed solely of representatives of the nine member countries of the European Economic Community. The Council of Europe invites the membership of all democratic European communities. Nineteen states are represented, and those 19 states have a population of 350 million. Greece, on achieving a democratic form of government once again, was reinstated. Portugal recently became a member, and it is hoped that Spain may soon join.

The Council of Europe is the oldest and largest political organization in western Europe, having been founded in 1949. In its role as a parliamentary forum, the Council provides discussion of internal problems of western Europe, except for the purely military aspects of defence. For example, the Council upholds human rights and strives to improve standards in such areas as public health, hygiene, labour, public welfare, education, cultural development, crime prevention and treatment of delinquents, regional and town planning, science and technological policy, and it also tries to establish a network of common laws. It has established a European Court of Human Rights, and a European commission was also established. In all, about 80 expert committees and subcommittees meet regularly to carry out programs in these areas. The Council invites observer delegates from non-European democratic nations. Such delegations have included those from the United States, Latin America, Japan, Australia, Israel and Canada.

Mr. Czernetz, President of the Assembly, welcomed to the 29th Session representatives of the United States Congress, members of the Finnish Reiksdag and our delegation. As I said before, the main discussion at this session of two and a half days was on the implementation of the Helsinki Agreement, and the approach to be taken at the pending Belgrade Conference on June 6.

The Helsinki Agreement was something which the Soviet Union had certainly been pushing to achieve for a long time. In fact, it may be recalled that the Soviet Union had been pushing for a Helsinki Conference since the death of Stalin in 1953. In 1954 Molotov proposed a 50-year European collective security pact envisaging a neutralized and divided Germany. The three western powers of occupation in 1954 countered with a proposal for a United Germany with free elections in all zones. It was a long and tortuous road of 22 years before the western powers agreed to the conference.

Marshall Bulganin had revised the Soviet idea in 1955, although there had been some rigidity between east and west because of East Germany's signing the Warsaw Pact, and West Germany's being admitted to the Atlantic Alliance. Then in 1956 we saw the ruthless suppression of the Hungarian Revolution and again the idea was dropped for a period of time. But Gromyko proposed it in 1959, and again there were Soviet proposals in 1965 at Bucharest, followed by the Karlov Vary Declaration in 1967. But then in 1968 came the arrogant Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia. In that same year, as most senators will recall, Mr. Brezhnev propounded the doctrine of limited sovereignty for socialist states, to protect the socialist regime, once established, by armed force, if necessary.

The western countries held out for a Helsinki Conference because they wanted to see an improvement of the Berlin situation. The Berlin Basic Treaty was then signed in 1972, and there was progress also in the Strategic Arms Limitations Talks and the mutual balanced force reductions in central Europe. These last two aspects were significant to the west.

It has been said that Mr. Brezhnev in many ways fathered the 1975 Helsinki Declaration. Why? The European delegates with whom I talked had no illusions about what the Soviet Union hoped to gain from these accords. They confirmed to me that the Soviet objectives were similar to those indicated in an article by G. G. Crean, formerly the Canadian Ambassador to West Germany. He had written in a text issued by the Canadian Institute of International Affairs that what the Soviet Union had wanted was a quick summit conference followed by an endorsement of the territorial status quo in Europe, by which they would thus legitimize their hold on the occupied nations.

The second Soviet objective resulted from the state of the Soviet economy. Technological spinoffs in their very sophisticated space and missile industries had not reached into their consumer industries. There had been internal pressure in the Soviet Union for consumer goods, for higher productivity in agriculture and for a better distribution service.

A third long-term Soviet objective was to bring about the direct harnessing of western industrial and technological capacity to Soviet needs; and a further Soviet objective was to create a climate of détente in which the west might relax its defence forces, start bickering internally and present the Soviet Union the opportunity to advance its consistent pursuit of ideological and social aims in the west.

In reading the excellent speech which Senator Yuzyk gave at Texas University, I saw that he confirmed this again with the quotations he made from Major-General Sezna's papers, which were smuggled out. Major-General Sezna was a top person in the Warsaw Pact, and his papers showed that the strategy of the Warsaw Pact countries towards the west was to try to develop an atmosphere of détente by which the western alliance would be seduced into relaxing its defences.

The Helsinki Declaration is a complicated, complex document, which is open to many interpretations, but the Soviet Union is making it fairly clear what they feel the interpretation of détente means. At the 25th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Mr. Brezhnev stated:

Détente did not and could not abolish or modify in any way the laws of the class struggle.

That means that the Soviet interpretation of détente does not preclude the continuing encouragement of social change in the democracies by means other than military.

I should add that at the session the delegates with whom I talked did not suffer from détente euphoria. Certainly, they acknowledged the complexity and vagueness of the language in the Final Act, which had resulted from the requirement of a consensus among 35 nations on each clause, and would, therefore, make different interpretations likely and could provide difficulties in measuring compliance to each section of the act. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union had promised to take seriously all of the Helsinki pledges. Soviet Leader Brezhnev said in Helsinki:

We proceed from the assumption that all the countries represented at the Conference will translate into life the agreements reached. As regards the Soviet Union, it will do precisely that.

● (1540)

What exactly do these agreements include? First, I stress that the Helsinki Accord is not a formal treaty. In fact, that is specifically precluded by the 35 signatories from the regulations under article 102 of the United Nations Charter. Therefore, it can be said that in legal terms it does not settle, nor is it intended to settle, matters in dispute following the surrender of Germany, and Mr. Breau, our spokesman at the session, stressed this point with my wholehearted endorsement. He repeated the resolution of the Honourable Allan MacEachen in February 1976, in the House of Commons, which was adopted unanimously and which reads:

That the Helsinki Act in no way portrays the status quo in Europe. In particular, the status of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania as at present recognized by Canada—

And that is de jure recognition.

—has in no way been altered thereby.

In general terms, the purpose of the Helsinki document is not, as Prime Minister Trudeau stressed at a press conference in Helsinki, a peace treaty but it is an attempt to break down barriers between eastern and western Europe and to work towards an atmosphere of stability and co-operation.

There are three baskets or sections in the act. Basically, the first basket is a declaration of 10 principles, and these principles are similar to those in other international declarations—for example, the U.N. Charter—including principles on human rights. There are proposals on the non-use of force and for the peaceful settlement of disputes. It does allow for the change of frontiers in accordance with international law, by peaceful means and by agreement, and I understand from some delegates that that was put in at the insistence of the western allies.

Basket I calls for confidence-building measures in the form of advance notification of military manoeuvres.

Basket II deals with "Co-operation in the Field of Economics, of Science and Technology and of the Environment."

Basket III, which is the one that is of particular interest to me, is entitled "Co-operation in Humanitarian and other Fields," and these are dealt with under four headings. The first is Human Contacts; the second is Information; and the third and fourth are Co-operation and Exchanges in the fields of Culture and Education, respectively.

The delegates pointed out to me that the Soviet Union was obviously anxious to reach agreement at Helsinki, for there are included in the act phrases and statements of western interests that were accepted by the Soviet Union. For example, "Frontiers can be changed in accordance with international law, by peaceful means and by agreement." As one delegate pointed out, that, logically, would mean de jure recognition of existing political frontiers in eastern Europe. The document was also linked implicitly to mutual and balanced force reductions and strategic arms limitations talks, and, needless to say, the Soviet Union was not the prime mover of that section.

Basket III, Co-operation in Humanitarian and other Fields, was resisted by the Soviet Union, but without that section many western countries, including Canada, would not have been signatories. And Canada in particular—and I was told this by delegates—did sponsor a strong text on the reunification of families, and I think the men who worked on that text should be sincerely congratulated.

Now, the general opinion of this session to discuss the implementation of the Helsinki Act was that progress had been slow—indeed, in many aspects it had been minimal. I can give many examples of that. I have asked the Leader of the Government some questions, the answers to which show the pettiness on the part of the Soviet Union in responding to the accords. I asked, for example, and received an answer today, in connection with customs duty on parcels to relatives. This is important to relatives in the Soviet Union because when they apply for emigration they may no longer be employed, and they have to live off these parcels. What is the enthusiasm of the Soviet Union to bring about a greater amelioration of situations involving separated families? They have increased the customs duty by 100 to 300 per cent, and I understand that in some cases it has gone up by 600 per cent. I could go on in areas like this. So, on the whole, the delegates considered that the implementation of the Helsinki Act was slow, and in many cases minimal.

Most reports show that the Warsaw Pact countries have restricted the efforts to meet certain easily fulfilled provisions, while they are taking an aggressive stand to divert attention from the provisions they are not yet meeting. A delegate from Norway, Mr. Shulberg, suggested that the Helsinki Accords were not a menu from which one chooses only what one wishes, but were to be complied with in full. And Mr. Brezhnev said he would do so at Helsinki, and that is what the rest of the nations were hoping would be lived up to.

Most Warsaw Pact countries are looking for agreements on scientific and technological exchanges, economic cooperation and cultural exchanges, but they have shown reluctance—in some cases, great reluctance—towards increasing human rights and allowing family visits, freer travel and the free flow of ideas. They argue, when this is raised—for example, when President Carter said that human rights transcend national boundaries, and that that is part of the Helsinki Accord—that this is interference in their internal affairs.

Quite frankly, I had hoped that the government leader, in view of the fact that the follow-up in Belgrade is taking place on June 6, might have received from External Affairs a reply to my questions with respect to emigration from the Soviet Union and other countries, because I think, honourable senators, that we would agree it is a pretty dismal record that is shown by the figures. But I think as well that if we had those figures they would indicate that there are differences in approach on the parts of the countries in eastern Europe. As I understand it from talking to delegates, the Soviet Union, Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia—and this is the Canadian experience as well—have been the most cautious and restrictive in connection with emigration and the reunification of families. At the other end of the scale the one that has been most cooperative is Yugoslavia.

Although I have not received replies to my questions with respect to the flow of informations—another of the accords—I have been told that Poland is the largest importer among all eastern European countries of foreign newspapers. In fact, they claim that some 44 million copies of foreign newspapers and periodicals are coming from east and west, and are made publicly available in international press and book clubs. I should say that I appreciated Senator Yuzyk's sending to me, as I am sure he sent to other senators, a list of the restricted newspapers which Poland will not allow to be imported. I notice that two Canadian Polish newspapers are included. I feel that a large proportion of those 44 million copies are coming from the east, rather than from the west.

At this point I also thank Senator Yuzyk very much for the valuable material on which he has diligently and arduously worked to provide information in connection with this very important upcoming conference. I refer to the list of Ukrainians prisoners and the Charter '77 signed in Czechoslovakia, which was an expression by 500 signatories, extraordinarily brave people, who stood up and said they wanted to see the Czechoslovakian government implement the accords which it had signed. They talked of the program of the coalition of Polish independence and so on. In addition, I refer to his excellent speech on the human rights movement in the Soviet Union. He said he has a list of 162 persons in the Ukraine who were placed in prison for political reasons.

Before going to this conference, my father-in-law gave me a list of 30 Estonians similarly in jail. I had no opportunity to use it, but it burned in my pocket and gave me a sense of the reality of what actually is taking place with respect to human rights in the Soviet Union.

On my return to Canada I read the story, as perhaps other senators did, of the little Catholic girl in Lithuania. In June 1975 she was tried and sent to a concentration camp. Her alleged crime—this is in a country that had signed the Helsinki Accords—was an association with the "Chronicle of the Catholic Church" in Lithuania. In this pamphlet which was sent to me I read how she had defended herself before the court, refusing the farce of a public defender. These are her words to the tribunal, the words of a young girl who knew what her fate would be:

We are not afraid of your prisons and concentration camps and we consider it our duty to denounce your actions, which humiliate, discriminate and oppress people. To fight for human rights is everyone's sacred duty. I am happy to have the privilege of suffering for the Chronicle of the Catholic Church in Lithuania, for I am convinced of its truth and of its importance, and I will remain faithful to my convictions until my last breath.

I could read you the names of many who are in prison, in insane asylums and concentration camps, and certainly Senator Yuzyk has done that.

An American Congressman who spoke gave a list of dissenters in the Soviet Union and other European countries. Perhaps I might quote from his speech. He said:

It has dismayed and outraged Americans to see in the months since Helsinki a revival in the Communist nations of the repressive habits we had expected to see at least gradually ameliorated. The arrests of those soviet citizens who took the Helsinki accords seriously enough to seek their government's compliance—Professor Yuri Orlov, Aleksandr Ginsburg, Anatoli Shcharansky—

Let me point out that Madam Shcharansky was brought to the conference by one of the British delegates. Mr. Shcharansky is a Jewish leader in Moscow, and that is his crime. He is in jail, and there was an impassioned plea on the part of the British parliamentarian that the Soviet Union relent in some small way in connection with this man. The congressman continued:

—Mikola Rudenko and Oleksei Tykhy; the arrests in Prague of Charter '77 signatories Vaclav Havel, Jiri Lederer and Frantisek Pavlicek as well as the death—after exhausting interrogation—of Professor Jan Patocka; the arrest in Bucharest of Paul Goma; in East Germany the arrest of Hellmuth Nitsche, the surveillance of physicist Robert Havemann, the exiling of singer Wolf Biermann and the emigration—under pressure—of writer Thomas Brasch and Reiner Kunze—all these events speak of both the positive and negative impact of the Helsinki accords. They have been positive in stimulating voices of hope in societies where hopelessness was the norm. And they have been negative in failing to stay the hands of the governments which had their own pledges invoked against them.

Senator Lafond: Would Senator Thompson please identify the Congressman?

Senator Thompson: Yes, it was Congressman Donald M. Fraser.

Senator Rowe: I wonder if Senator Thompson would permit a question at this point? We have all been listening, I am sure, most intently to what he has had to say. However, he has been dwelling especially on those states behind the Iron Curtain which are under the direct control of Russia, in the sense that Russia is actually there in person, so to speak—the Baltic states—and has referred incidentally to some of the other states. What is the situation in Bulgaria? I believe Canadian and other parliamentarians are particularly interested in Bulgaria, because this fall the Interparliamentary Conference is to be held there. Is the situation any different in Bulgaria and, for that matter, Romania, from that in some of the other countries mentioned by Senator Thompson?

Senator Thompson: I appreciate Senator Rowe's question, but I do not have sufficient knowledge to go into the situation in Bulgaria and Romania. However, it is an important question. There is, obviously, an individual approach taken by the bloc of Warsaw Pact countries with respect to emigration. That is why I had hoped to get these figures, for some of them are easier with respect to emigration and the flow of information than others. They are not all repressive, but I am sorry that I cannot be specific in connection with those two countries.

It is not difficult to be skeptical about the Soviet Union's signature on the Helsinki Charter. I myself go back in memory to the Soviet-German treaty, the Ribbentrop-Molotov Pact of 1939, which prepared the way for the forcible annexation by the U.S.S.R. of territories which she retains to this day, and which she wanted the Helsinki Conference to sanction as the U.S.S.R.'s integral possessions in perpetuity.

My father-in-law, about whom I spoke earlier, can recall over 16 treaties and covenants that have been broken by the U.S.S.R. with respect to the Soviet occupation of Esthonia. Senator James Eastwood, Chairman of the United States Judiciary Committee, recalled in 1964 that since the Soviet Union came into existence its government has broken its word to virtually every country to which it ever gave a signed promise. His committee recorded the details of over 100 Soviet treaty violations. Senator Yuzyk, my former professor in Ukrainian and a distinguished Soviet historian, quoted in his Texas speech the dictum of Lenin: "Promises are like pie crusts, made to be broken." He also quoted Stalin's words in 1913: "Sincere diplomacy is no more possible than dry water or iron wood."

I referred to the history of the little Lithuanian girl, and I could go on and on, honourable senators, as many of you could, with an almost unbearable litany of persons who are suffering harassments, beatings and torture in the institutional framework of repression embodied in the prisons and insane asylums of the Soviet Union. Let me conclude by offering some flickers of hope about this Helsinki Conference.

First, the majority of delegates appeared, in their speeches, to be fully aware of the realities of the Communist world. They live far closer to the Soviet threat than we. Let us not forget that many of these small countries have shown great courage against threats. I shall always remember little Austria, a country which kept its borders open against threats by the Soviet Union in order that both Hungarian and Czechoslovakian refugees could escape to freedom. Little Sweden has a proud record of courageous hospitality to flows of refugees from Communist countries, which included my own wife and her family. Little Norway, when the Czechoslovakian government cracked down on the 500 signers of Charter '77, the petition calling for observation of the human rights section of the Helsinki Accord, called off the signing of a new trade treaty with Czechoslovakia.

What is also significant is that the French, the Spanish and the British Communist parties, together with groups of dissidents in Poland and Hungary, expressed solidarity with the beleaguered signers of Charter '77, and, of course, from the Soviet Union came a protest by the irrepressible Zakharov.

Also of great significance, as Mark Gayne pointed out in a recent article in the Toronto Star—and I think this may be what Senator Rowe had in mind when he raised the question—is that Brezhnev's enunciation of 1976 that "all Communist states are bound to become alike in foreign policy, economy and daily life, and tightly bound with each other and the Soviet Union," is not acceptable to all Communist states. They no longer see the Soviet lifestyle as the ideal to be followed. After the Soviet Union, with great enthusiasm, published all 30,000 words of the Helsinki Accords in Pravda and Izvestia, which I understand have a circulation of about 20 million in the Soviet Union, and having spread this across the entire country, their own implementation of all sections of the agreement will be watched by peoples in Europe, Africa, Asia and Latin America, where their alleged aim is to present themselves as champions of oppressed peoples.

The delegates, in their speeches, were obviously fully aware that only by honouring their own undertakings can the western participants, whenever necessary, insist on the eastern European governments keeping to theirs. For example, Congressman Fraser of the United States openly admitted at the session that his government has a cumbersome law governing the distribution of both entry visas for immigrants and temporary visas, which was vulnerable to complaint. I think that we in Canada should be on guard against such abuses. I noted that Senator Asselin, in his excellent speech, suggested that we should be very careful, in our enthusiasm for development, still to respect the rights of minorities.

To the sceptics—and I include myself in that group—the Helsinki Conference did not, as we thought, and as I am sure the Soviet Union thought, weaken western cohesion. On the contrary, I found a re-affirmation of the principles of freedom being expressed by representatives of like-minded nations, which had coordinated their approach to political problems. Some of these delegates, and some of the speakers, may appear rather mild and soft spoken, but they are very tough in connection with their convictions with respect to democracy. I think particularly of the speech by Premier Soares of Portugal, who spoke to us about the democratic forum which now exists in that country. This man, quietly spoken, humble person that he is, was in jail 12 times during his fight to bring democracy to Portugal.

I was, therefore, encouraged by the calibre of the delegates. Those with whom I talked recognized the necessity of political cohesion, but they also considered it vital to maintain the forces necessary to preserve a military and strategic balance.

The twenty-second annual assembly of NATO in Williamsburg has stated that "détente is at the present time the only valid alternative to policies of crises and confrontation." In their final communiqué, the NATO delegates stressed the great importance they attach to the implementation by all the signatory states of all the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. At the forthcoming Belgrade meeting, after their monitoring of the implementation, the allies will work for a constructive outcome which will promote better relations between the participating states and be beneficial to all their peoples.

The European Council has kept track of and has listed the questions that have been asked, and the debates that have taken place, concerning the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act in the individual parliamentary forums, and they gathered these together in the final report on the conference.

There is a great deal of interest in all the free parliaments of Europe in connection with the implementation of the Helsinki Accord. The delegates never had any illusions about the long tortuous path to the achievement of cooperation and trust between the communists and democratic countries. They wanted me to stress that the Final Act—and some people expected wonders from it—was not designed to bring about a revolution in European relations but, by pragmatic and constructive steps, by very slow steps, was expected to achieve stability and human progress between the peoples of the European states with their different political and social systems. Patience is not the long suit of democratic governments, but we will have to learn it in connection with this relationship which it is hoped will be developed. Helsinki is a fragile declaration which the delegates are aware was never intended to overcome communism or change the course of history overnight.

I have already quoted from the text of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs article by Mr. Crean. If I may quote from it again, he said that the Helsinki Accord —offers in many ways an unusual opportunity for the Western powers to pursue their interests in maintaining a stable situation in Europe. This requires an effort by the Western powers to contribute the necessary forces to maintain the military and strategic balance, the capacity to reach economic and technical agreements amongst themselves to ensure economic stability domestically and internationally, and the political will to make the parliamentary system of government work for the general well-being of their peoples. Finally, the Western powers must be able to demonstrate a cohesive ability to continue negotiations with the Warsaw Pact powers in order to maintain and improve stability and co-operation between the two groups of powers and their peoples.

Now, this does not mean that at the Helsinki follow-up in Belgrade the Council members will be silent about the blatant violations of the accords. One delegate, in his speech, gave the following quotation from Edmund Burke, which I think is worth repeating:

For evil to triumph, it is enough that good men do nothing.

But the delegates are not going to Belgrade with shrill, violent denunciations. Mr. Breau, speaking on our behalf—and I believe he represented the general consensus of the delegates towards the Belgrade meeting—said:

At Belgrade Canada will be firm, clear and will see to it that its experiences are made public. Our counterparts in the East must accept that public opinion in our pluralistic and democratic society will never yield on such fundamental questions as individual liberties.

After expressing his outrage and dismay at the arrest of Soviet, Czechoslovakian and other citizens who feel that their countries should at least comply with what they had signed, Congressman Fraser ended his statement with these words:

So it is in our interest—not just that of isolated individuals whose example we admire from afar—to promote that discourse at every opportunity . . . It will be the longest and most arduous aspect of our search to implement the Helsinki Accords, but for our security and self-respect it is the most worthwhile effort we can undertake.

I remain skeptical, although I admire the determined, realistic approach of many of those delegates. There appears no viable alternative to détente. I shall watch closely what goes on at the Belgrade conference, and I am confident that the Honourable Don Jamieson and the Canadian representatives will pursue a firm, clear policy, acknowledging that abuses of human rights, wherever they may occur, are the legitimate subject of international concern.

The Right Honourable David Owen, the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, acknowledged what we, those of us who are watching the Belgrade conference from outside, must all recognize. He said:

—a government's first task is to help provide and sustain the framework of peace and security within which human rights can be discussed, championed and enlarged . . . We in the west must do all we can to ensure not only that détente does not go into reverse but also that it broadens the area of common ground between east and west. This calls for good will and high negotiating skill.

As much as many of us would warm to hear shrill polemics and harsh denunciations, I am fully aware that the Belgrade forum is not a time for such displays but rather, as the Council itself decided, is a time for hard, able bargaining without sweeping facts under the carpet. I wish the Canadian delegation and all those who will be attending the Belgrade conference good luck in their endeavours.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate in this debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 6, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, June 6, 1977

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report relating to matters transacted by the Registrar General of Canada as Registrar under the Trade Unions Act during the year ended December 31, 1976, pursuant to section 30 of the said Act, Chapter T-11, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1977-1211, dated May 5, 1977, amending Schedule I to the Canada Grain Act, effective August 1, 1977, pursuant to section 15(6) of the said Act, Chapter 7, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow June 7, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STATEMENTS BY DEPUTY LEADER—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if the statements made by the deputy leader in the debate on the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which appear in the Debates of the Senate dated May 31, at page 783, represent the views of the government, particularly the views of the Department of Justice?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that these statements do substantially represent the views of the government. However, Senator Langlois has always been able to make a valuable contribution to debate in this chamber in his own right.

Senator Grosart: I did not ask that.

Senator Flynn: Which part is Senator Langlois' contribution?

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-47, to amend the Export Development Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the Export Development Act appears in the Statutes of Canada for 1968-69 as Chapter 39. Not only is the Senate quite familiar with this particular piece of legislation, but it is also familiar with its antecedent legislation. By section 3 of the Export Development Act there was established an organization known as the Export Development Corporation. This is a crown corporation which began doing business on October 1, 1969. It has 12 directors, all appointed by order in council. Seven of them are from the public service and five are from outside. For honourable senators who may be interested in these estimable gentlemen, both their names and their pictures appear on page 3 of the annual report of the corporation.

The Export Development Corporation is a successor to the Export Credit Insurance Corporation, which came into being by legislation in this Parliament in 1944. The existing act has been amended four times since it was passed in 1968-69. The previous act was before this house on many occasions, and the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of this house is thoroughly familiar with the operations of the corporation.

The powers of the corporation generally are to facilitate and develop trade between Canada and other countries by means of financial and other powers provided in the legislation. In other words, the corporation is a facility to assist exporters and investors abroad and to protect Canadian exporters and investors abroad against uncertainties in foreign markets. Those uncertainties are thought to be possible of development in some of the developed countries of the world, some of the state trading countries of eastern Europe, some of the developing countries along the equatorial belt, and in the new countries both of the Middle East and the Far East.

The facilities provided by the corporation are not a subsidy either on exports or to exporters. Generally speaking, facilities of the corporation are not used in the trade between Canada and the United States.

The methods used by the corporation are, generally speaking, threefold. They are loans to foreign buyers, insurance policies issued to Canadian exporters against risks incurred in foreign trade, and guarantees of investments made by Canadians abroad in certain cases.

The first of the methods I propose to deal with will be loans to foreign buyers of Canadian capital goods and services. The easiest way for me to do this is to use an example, which I take from page 15 of the annual report of the corporation. In this case the exporter from Canada was the firm of Surveyer, Nenniger and Chenevert, Inc. of Montreal. The product exported was equipment and services for a cement plant. The foreign customer is a cement company in Ecuador, South America. The amount of the loan, as reported in the annual report, is $25 million. I am told that the particular project has a value of some $44.4 million. In such cases, if appropriate terms can be arranged with the foreign customer, the Export Development Corporation grants a loan. In this case the loan was $25 million.

The disbursement of the loan, however, is not made to Ecuador; it is made to the Canadian exporter for the account of the foreign customer, and in cash. In that way suppliers of goods, materials and services in Canada are able to get paid that much more quickly. That, generally speaking, is the process which takes place when a loan is granted.

Sometimes, however, the loans are made in the ordinary course of commercial dealings by banks, and in such cases the Export Development Corporation is authorized by the mother act to guarantee such loans for the Canadian commercial organization which makes the loan. I am told there is considerable participation by Canadian banks in the lending operations of the Export Development Corporation—in fact, to the extent of approximately 30 per cent of the total lending that is done.

In addition to loans which can be made by the corporation, the mother act, the Export Development Act, authorizes the Governor in Council, in cases where the national interest is certified to be applicable, to authorize loans to be made to foreign customers outside the normal practice that obtains when the Export Development Corporation scrutinizes a loan application.

I take a further example, this time from page 17 of the annual report, where the borrower was a Norwegian tug company, and the exporter was Marystown Shipyard Limited in Newfoundland, with which Senator Cook will be familiar. The product was five ocean-going tugs, and the amount of the loan was $14 million.

I am told that despite the fact that there is this special provision for loans to be authorized by the government, by order in council, outside the normal practice of the corporation, there have been no failures, no defaults, on any such loans, which are authorized by section 31 of the mother act.

I should point out that there is a ceiling on loans, and insofar as the corporation is concerned the ceiling on loans and guarantees is $4½ billion, and outstanding as at the end of last year, December 31, 1976, the amount was $2.4 billion. There is also a ceiling on loans which may be authorized by order in council of $850 million, and there is outstanding against such ceiling some $450 million worth of loans. There is a good deal more information on both these types of loans in the annual report. When this bill is before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, if it is given second reading by the Senate, I am assured there will be ample copies of the annual report available for the scrutiny of members of that committee.

In the other place there was some question about the interest rate that is charged by the corporation for loans. I understand that there is a considerable element of confidentiality in this matter, but I do notice, as indicated on page 42 of the annual report, that the cost of money to the corporation varies between 8½ and 8¾ per cent, according to a statement made by the Auditor General. So it is obvious that the corporation charges a rate higher than that, and I understand it could be anywhere from 9½ to 10 per cent. I would therefore think that the rates charged by the corporation are usually the competitive rates available in the circumstances governing export credits.

The second instrument used by the corporation for the promotion of foreign trade is the export credits insurance instrument. These are contracts of insurance which protect Canadian exporters on risks incurred by dealing with foreign buyers in respect of matters like insolvency, the default of a foreign buyer, the slow pay of a foreign buyer or the rejection of Canadian goods contracted to be bought by a foreign buyer.

Again, too, these contracts of insurance can be issued by the Export Development Corporation of its own motion, or they can be authorized in the national interest by order in council of the Government of Canada. The two sections of the mother act applicable here are sections 24 and 27.

There are ceilings imposed upon both types of export credits insurance by the mother act. Sections 26 and 28 are the two sections which govern these ceilings, and they are the two sections which are amended by this bill.

The ceiling now imposed upon the Export Development Corporation and upon the government for this kind of operation, the issue of export credits insurance, is $750 million. The present exposure of the corporation to insurance risks is now $647 million. So the corporation is within $100 million of its ceiling. On the government side, by order in council, the exposure is $247 million.

I may say that the exports insured in 1976 by the corporation had a value of $1½ billion. That was up 48 per cent from the value of business covered in the year 1976, the year before the period covered in the annual report.

Honourable senators may be interested to know the distribution of insurance among various classes of goods. I am told that for food and agricultural products the coverage is some $44 million. In other words, that was the value of food and agricultural products exported and covered by export credits insurance. In the case of crude materials, the figure is some $37 million. The value of fabricated materials was $586.9 million, and the value of end-products was $683 million. All these figures appear on page 25 of the annual report. It is worth noting that the heavy emphasis is upon fabricated and completely manufactured products, and that the total coverage by the insurance policies issued for all goods exported in 1976 was $1.3 million.

• (2030)

As I have said, the two sections dealing with export credit insurance, and which impose ceilings, are sections 26 and 28 of the mother act. It is these two sections that are now being amended. The proposal is that the ceiling imposed on the Export Development Corporation be increased from $750 million to $2.5 billion. By section 28 it is proposed that the ceiling imposed upon the government now of $750 million be raised to $1 billion.

It is worthwhile mentioning that the Canadian program for export credits insurance was increased by 20 per cent in 1976 over 1975. This trend has developed in other countries. For example, in the United Kingdom the increase in 1976 over 1975 was some 40 per cent.

I should tell honourable senators—perhaps I am only reminding them of something that most already know—that there is no coverage in terms of exports credits insurance provided by the private sector that is comparable to that provided by this corporation. There has been a great demand by Canadian exporters, particularly exporters of capital goods and capital machinery, for the provision of protection during production or pre-shipment risk. Obviously, in this period when there are heavy commitments made by manufacturers in Canada for the production of heavy equipment such as pulp and paper machinery, mining machinery and chemical equipment, substantial moneys are required to be expended in order to meet the deadlines of such contracts. If there is any danger of default or failure to follow through in the contracts, then the Canadian manufacturer is at a very severe risk. This kind of coverage is being sought out more and more, and I am told the corporation desires to meet these demands.

The third instrument available to the corporation to promote Canadian trade covers guarantees made by Canadians abroad. The risks covered, as specified by the act, are losses to Canadian investors because of political action abroad such as expropriation, confiscation, and damages incurred by war or revolution. The ceiling imposed by the act for such risks is $250 million. The exposure is about $100 million. Generally speaking, the areas where risks of this kind apply are said to be Africa, the Far East and the Caribbean. Again, this is an area where I am told there is considerable confidentiality required.

I should like to make just a few general observations about the corporation. First of all, I should remind honourable senators that it does not pay income tax.

The retained earnings of the corporation at the end of last year were $71 million, which was an increase of some $17 million over the figure for the year 1975. The net income for the year, of course, was the amount of the additional retained earnings, namely, $17.5 million. I think at the committee stage it would be appropriate to get answers about the loans receivable and exposure on claims under the insurance contracts, and the provision for losses in both of these categories.

I am told that on the insurance program since 1974 the premium income has always exceeded the total amount of the claims made. I am told, too, that under the loan program there have been no defaults. Part of this, of course, is due to the fact that a great many of these loans are rescheduled if there is danger of default. Out of $1.3 billion of loans some $61 million have been rescheduled, and I am told that of that $61 million rescheduled $30 million has already been recovered. It seems to me that the loan and insurance programs, which would be subject to the scrutiny of members of the committee, are well run operations.

I am also told that in 1976 the export segment of Canadian GNP was some $45 billion, of which $39 billion is trade with the United States and sales abroad of foodstuffs, particularly wheat, where the terms of the sale shipment in the case of wheat are made by the Canadian Wheat Board. This would leave some $6 billion of Canadian commercial exports elsewhere abroad. Of that $6 billion, $2 billion, or 33 per cent, are assisted in some way by the Export Development Corporation. I therefore think it has a good deal of influence in the non-United States export trade of Canada. While it may be a relatively small proportion of the total export trade of Canada, it is still a significant figure. I would think the Senate would want to concur in the proposal to change the ceilings with respect to the issue of export credit insurance.

Senator Grosart: I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill one question. He used the phrase "the liability of the corporation," and then the phrase "the liability of the government," indicating that there might be some distinction. It seems to me that the bill before us refers only to the liability of the corporation, which I presume would be a liability of the government. Was there a reason for making a distinction? Is the liability covered by this bill not all a liability that would be assumed by the Export Development Corporation, and therefore by the government?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I think the detail of the answer to this should be obtained in committee, but perhaps the way to express it is this. Where the contract of insurance has been issued in the normal course of operations of the corporation, if there is a payment to be made under the insurance contract that is issued, the corporation has a reserve there out of which the payment is made. I suppose that as to the adequacy of the reserve proposed, we will let that stand until the committee hearings. With respect to the question as to whether there are claims made under export credits insurance authorized not in the normal course of events by the corporation but by order in council, the first resort, payment of such claims would be from the resources of the corporation. There may be a provision in the act that if these resources fail the consolidated revenue fund would stand behind it. I am not positive about this, but in my opinion it is a matter to which an answer should be given in committee.

JUDGES ACT AND OTHER ACTS IN RESPECT OF JUDICIAL MATTERS

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. George McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-50, to amend the Judges Act and other acts in respect of judicial matters.

He said: Honourable senators, there has been a growing practice, I notice, in the Senate to refer to bills from the other place as simple bills. I hope I will not be guilty of that practice tonight.

Senator Flynn: It is a decreasing practice, I assure you.

Senator McIlraith: I hope to decrease the practice further tonight. The bill before us, Bill C-50, is a rather interesting bill, and may I say that while it can be referred to as a little bill it is a rather complex one in some respects. It deals with some matters of principle of major importance, as well as several relatively unimportant administrative changes in the Judges Act and some other related acts. Bearing in mind the desirability and, indeed, the necessity of maintaining the judiciary of this country in a position in which it can effectively, intelligently and independently carry out the heavy duties which rest upon judges, the bill before us will, I am sure, be looked upon with favour by the Senate, as it was by all parties in the House of Commons.

The function of guarding the supremacy of the law is one of our most basic constitutional principles and it requires, among other things, the maintenance of an independent judiciary, not only one that is independent but one that is seen by the public to be independent. While our record in this country in this regard is one of which I believe most Canadians will be proud, it is also one that requires the conscious care and attention of the executive and the legislative arm of government. Hence the bill before us tonight.

With the increasing complexity that has come in our lives by virtue of the increased complexity of the legislation itself and the rapid extension of government involvement in matters that formerly were regarded as outside the responsibility of the government, coupled with the extension of the rights of individuals to bring actions against the crown, and to bring the bureaucracy into a position in which it is answerable to the members of the public, the workloads in the courts have increased sharply, so much so that now the crown itself is the major litigant in many of the courts.

Senator Grosart: Such as the Federal Court.

Senator McIlraith: The Federal Court, yes. However, in some of the other courts there is quite an increase as well, and we have the anomalous situation that the main litigant, or party before the court, the Department of Justice, has the responsibility for handling the administrative affairs of the federally constituted court, and the administrative affairs relating to the federally appointed judiciary; that is, their salaries, annuities, leave of absence, and other related matters. This anomaly of having the main litigant with the dual role of appearing before the court, presumably to have a wholly impartial and independent judgment rendered by a judge, at the same time as it has administrative responsibility for the judiciary, is something that requires attention. The bill deals directly with this point. That is why I indicated that I believe it raises a matter of important principle.

The method of dealing with the problem is removing from the Department of Justice the responsibility for the administrative affairs of the courts and judges. The administrative responsibilities for the courts and the federally appointed judges will be transferred from the department, and it is proposed by the bill to transfer this responsibility for all administration of these affairs for all the federally appointed judges, except those in the Supreme Court of Canada, and for the Federal Court of Canada and the Canadian Judicial Council, to the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs.

This is a new position being created. The position will carry with it the rank and status of deputy minister, but there is a rather interesting distinction between that office and that of a deputy minister, even though he carries the rank and status of a deputy minister. The appointment of the commissioner is made on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice and after consultation with the Canadian Judicial Council, unlike a deputy minister for whom the appointment is made on the recommendation of the Prime Minister and without any necessity of consultation. This new regime for administration of judicial affairs, it will be noted, fully preserves the principle of ministerial responsibility to Parliament for the expenditure of public funds, and at the same time removes from the executive the administrative responsibility for administering budget, salaries, allowances and leaves of absence and that sort of thing and certain other operational requirements for the federal courts and the Canadian Judicial Council.

In the Supreme Court of Canada these functions will be transferred to the registrar. He is designated as the officer to perform these functions. The registrar will be responsible to the Minister of Justice for his general administrative duties, as is the commissioner, but he will be under the supervision of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada in carrying out the day-to-day administration of the court. Thus the administration of the library of the Supreme Court of Canada, the publication of the Supreme Court reports and other matters of that nature, which by the former act were the responsibility of the Minister of Justice, will now be transferred to the court, and administered through the registrar under the supervision of the Chief Justice.

Dealing next with the Canadian Judicial Council, that body, as honourable senators are aware, was created in 1971 and has functioned relatively well since its establishment. It was created to provide uniformity, efficiency, and improvement in the quality of judicial services in the county, district and superior courts. Among other things, it has responsibility for the establishment of judicial conferences and, in certain instances and under certain circumstances, the establishment of inquiries into the conduct of judges. The Canadian Judicial Council is composed of the 24 chief justices of the superior courts. Because of the nature of the jurisdiction of the county courts and their number, and the fact that they are dealing with such a large volume of criminal cases, it has been found, as a matter of experience, that there appears to be a need for some more adequate representation on their part on the Canadian Judicial Council.

Taking Ontario as an example, there are, I believe, some 121 county court judges. In order to give this level of the judiciary more direct involvement in the affairs of the council, it is proposed, instead of enlarging the council—it was felt desirable to preserve the total composition at 24—that there be authority granted for the creation of a committee of the county and district courts, and that is provided in the amending bill. Where there is no Chief Judge, there is provision for the senior judge to be named to the committee. This committee, incidentally, as matters stand, would exclude the provinces of Quebec and Prince Edward Island as there are no county court systems in those provinces.

In addition to the amendments I have mentioned thus far, which involve matters of principle of some concern to parliamentarians and, indeed, matters of major importance, there are several other provisions in the bill which are of an administrative nature. While they may be important in themselves, they do not involve great matters of principle. There is provision, for example, for increasing the salaries of judges by $2,000 on April 1, 1977, and a further $2,000 on April 1, 1978. There is a provision for the readjustment and increase in the conference allowances for judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, and an incidental increase for the number of judges in certain of the provinces. Those increases, of course, are granted only after a request from the attorney general of the province in question.

There is also a provision for judges at large, additional to those fixed by act of Parliament. These additional judges are being provided in order to meet the anticipated need for appointments to the proposed unified family courts. There is nothing in the bill which directly deals with the unified family court system, but there are rather interesting experiments now being carried on in British Columbia and Ontario, and one is to be implemented in Manitoba this year. Proposals for such courts have also been referred to in the Speeches from the Throne in Newfoundland and Saskatchewan. It will mean that there will be one judge dealing with divorce, maintenance orders, custody of children, and all related matters in one action, as opposed to the rather costly and unsatisfactory system which is now in place of having to go to several courts to get a family law dispute resolved. This, it is hoped, will solve that problem. It is an interesting experiment, and incidentally, there have been some discussions going on with the Quebec Attorney General, as well as all of the others, on this subject.

There are other minor amendments contained in the bill. For instance, one of not very great importance, I respectfully submit, with due deference to the authorities, is the provision relating to the residence requirements for judges. The present act requires judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario to live within 25 miles of the provincial capital, and the bill would change that distance to 40 kilometres. Another incidental amendment which is rather interesting, and of somewhat more importance, relates to the qualifications for appointment of judges. Under the present act, a person, to be appointed a judge, has to have practised at the bar for a period of 10 years prior to his appointment. That means, of course, that a magistrate, or a provincial court judge, as he is called in some provinces, who practised nine years at the bar before being appointed, by virtue of his accepting the appointment as magistrate or provincial court judge, rendered himself for all time ineligible for appointment to any of the higher courts.

If it is the wish of honourable senators, assuming the bill receives second reading, I would propose that it be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

There was, incidentally, a table prepared setting out the numbers of federally appointed judges in all of the various courts of the country as of April 30, 1977, and the changes in numbers which would be brought about by this amending bill. That table was placed on the record of the other place as an appendix to Hansard. I would not propose that that be done here; rather, I propose that it be put on record in the committee.

Senator Inman: Might I ask the honourable senator a question? When did they do away with county court judges in Prince Edward Island?

Senator McIlraith: I am not certain of the answer to that question, but I believe it was a couple of years ago. Perhaps it was in 1975, but I cannot say that for sure.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL UNITY

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 2, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault, calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to join with all previous speakers in this debate who have expressed appreciation to Senator Perrault for introducing this motion, and also to extend to him, and to those who have preceded me, my congratulations on the excellence of their contributions.

Senator Perrault gave a vivid description of the richness and diversity of the various cultures which make up the cultural heritage we have developed here in Canada, and he and several other senators stressed the fact that constitutionally the mission of the Senate fits the crisis that faces us today because the founding fathers brought the Senate into existence for the very purpose of ensuring that the cultural and other rights of the minorities would be preserved.

Had the Senate pursued this mission a little more actively, the situation we now face might have been averted. I agree with them, therefore, that it is most fitting, and indeed an obligation, that the Senate should give leadership in bringing these issues before the Canadian people in a manner that will result in an open and frank public discussion.

In this connection I would point out to honourable senators that I expressed a similar viewpoint in this chamber on February 22 last when I supported a motion by Senator Cook calling the attention of the Senate to matters of interest concerning Labrador and the desirability of establishing a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to examine matters of mutual interest to all Canadians, whether they reside in the Province of Quebec or elsewhere in Canada.

At that time I pointed out that there are three jobs to be done. The first one is to get the facts, and this I felt could best be done by a joint committee. The second task is to interpret different parts of Canada to each other making Canadians everywhere aware of each other's hopes and aspirations, and developing an awareness and appreciation of each other's contributions to the nation as a whole. The third task is to mobilize the positive forces in our nation in the cause of national unity. I felt that the second and third tasks could best be done by a committee of the Senate.

The inquiry now before us is in very similar vein as it calls the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

As Senator Perrault has pointed out, Canada is a vast geographical expanse and the distances that separate us, one region from another, are so great that it is natural for each region to become preoccupied with its own problems and difficulties without giving much thought to other regions or to the nation as a whole. Under those circumstances it is all too easy for those who, for their own purposes, would exploit our differences and difficulties to create disunity by blaming everything on faceless people in far away Ottawa. The Senate can do something about this because the Senate can, in a sense, bring part of Ottawa and part of Parliament to the people. It may be that we are late in realizing this part of our mission, but even now it is better late than never.

It is evident that our ignorance, misunderstanding and lack of appreciation of each other is due in large measure to a communications gap which has been allowed to develop in spite of technological advances in the communications industry. In fact, it may have developed in some degree because of these technological advances which, by spreading misinformation, suspicion and prejudice, can create mistrust and confusion among us and at the same time occupy our time so fully with trivial and extraneous matters that we have no time for each other or for the problems of the nation as a whole. To develop national unity we must find some means of overcoming this communications gap and we must also strive for higher standards of ethics and responsibility in the use of the printed and electronic media. Better and cheaper means of transportation are an absolute necessity to enable Canadians to travel around our vast country and get to know each other better.

Another essential change, and perhaps the most important of all, is a change of attitude. This will probably be the most difficult to achieve because attitudes are so much a part of ourselves that we are not really aware of them until they are pointed out to us. Those of us who come from Newfoundland are painfully aware of the colonial attitude that is exhibited towards us—at times by the federal government, at other times by certain federal ministers, almost always by the federal bureaucracy, and often by our fellow Canadians in other provinces.

I still have painful memories of my early years as a member of the Commons, when almost every day I would be approached by one of my colleagues who would start up a conversation by asking, "How are things going back in your province? How do Newfoundlanders like being a part of Canada?" I would invariably reply, "We are getting along very well and we are just as proud to be Canada's newest province as we were to be Britain's oldest colony, but..." However, they never wanted to hear what came after the word "but." As soon as I reached that word I would invariably be interrupted with the question, "Aren't your people getting the baby bonus?"

In Newfoundland our economic aspirations are quite modest but they do extend beyond living on handouts from the federal government. As Senator Cook pointed out in his excellent speech last week, we do not have much farm land and our forests and mineral resources are now rather limited. But we do have hydro potential and rich ocean resources. In fact, we have far greater resources than Iceland, Singapore or Hong Kong, and we want to develop what resources we have to create jobs and wealth, and to raise our own standard of living by our own efforts.

However, federal policies have not helped very much in this direction. The iron mines in Labrador and the hydro power of the Upper Churchill would have never been developed were it not for foreign capital. When Newfoundland became part of Canada in 1949, we had no public debt and a $40 million surplus. Today, instead of a surplus, we have a public debt of around $2¼ billion which is a staggering burden for less than half a million people. In common with other Canadians below the poverty line, Newfoundlanders in the bottom 20 per cent income groups aspire to the enjoyment of the necessities of life and ordinary comforts and pleasures. I do not think anyone can aspire to much less than that.

We also have our own distinct culture of which we are quite proud, although other Canadians may laugh at it and make jokes about it. Fortunately, we Newfoundlanders have learned to laugh at ourselves so that sort of thing does not disturb us very much. In any case, the mainland influence is having its effect and this culture, kept intact by 500 years of isolation, will disappear within a few years.

We also have our historic sites and monuments. Our history dates back far beyond that of mainland Canada, yet the financial assistance forthcoming from the federal government to preserve our historic places is minuscule compared to what is being provided to other provinces; and, since Newfoundland cannot afford to preserve them, these, too, will disappear before very long.

Economic and cultural aspirations are to a large extent interdependent. Despite the vast distances that divide and isolate us from one another, region by region or province by province, as far as the masses of the people are concerned—the ordinary man on the street—I believe both types of aspirations can be summed up in one word "dignity." The English word "dignity" comes from the Latin word "dignus," which means being worthy or having worth. It is an attribute assigned especially to man—that is, to mankind—to every man, woman and child, regardless of race, creed, or colour; of wealth, poverty or social position. Curiously enough, it is a word used much more frequently by atheists, humanists and Marxists than by Jews and Christians, although in fact it is the one word that separates atheistical philosophies from Judeo-Christian philosophies which hold that man has worth in himself because he is a created being. This presupposes a creator, which atheistic philosophies deny.

What do the words "human dignity" imply? In the first place, they imply certain God-given natural rights—the right to be free, the rights of freedom of religion and freedom of expression, the right to be free from fear and want, the right to equal opportunity in the development of talents and capabilities, and the right to contribute to society in the way best suited to the individual. These rights are not conferred by any government; they are basic natural rights inherent in the status of a created being.

Senator Steuart, in his most interesting contribution to this debate, raised the very pertinent question of how we managed to get into the mess in which we now find ourselves. Both he and Senator Rizzuto implied that education played a large part in bringing it about. I agree, although I believe there are other factors which have had equal influence.

I agree with the honourable senators because it is in the schools that the child has the first, and the best, opportunity to learn about the early beginnings of our country, the way it has developed and the contributions made toward its development by the two founding races, along with immigrants from various lands. It is the first opportunity for the child to learn and appreciate the cultures of the various ethnic groups that make up Canada, and the contributions which those various cultures have made to our present cultural heritage. The classroom also exerts a powerful influence in the shaping of attitudes toward others, particularly those whose backgrounds are different from our own.

A great difficulty, however, arises from the fact that the Constitution places education exclusively under provincial jurisdiction. Federal grants to the provinces for French language and manpower training are often misused and sometimes misappropriated because the federal government is limited in whatever influence, if any, it may be able to exert indirectly. As a result, education has become balkanized into 10 different departments of education, each a law unto itself, and so we have 10 different curricula, 10 different versions of Canadian history, 10 different sets of educational objectives, and 10 different sets of textbooks. School books have become so expensive that even the richest provinces cannot afford Canadian texts written especially for Canadian children. As a result, they usually select a basic text designed for schools in the United States, and arrange for a few alterations or adaptations to suit Canadian situations. Naturally, under such circumstances, very little material is included that portrays Canada as a whole, or shows that Canada as a nation is really much more than the sum of its parts.

I vividly recall a meeting of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty at which a number of chiefs of Indian bands appeared as witnesses and read passages from textbooks—history, literature and readers—portraying Indians as savages. They explained to the committee the negative and adverse attitudes which the use of those texts had created in white children against Indian children attending the same school. No wonder Indian children did not want to attend that school—the only one in that particular area—and ran away whenever they had the chance. One may well question to what extent the problems of our native people have been worsened by these and similar childhood experiences.

It is important to remember that this kind of situation is the direct result of our present Constitution, and is a classic example of the balkanization that can proliferate if other federal powers are transferred to the provinces. I strongly agree that giving more powers to the provinces will not ensure greater national unity. In fact, it could have the opposite effect.

The provinces are so jealous of their constitutional prerogatives with respect to education that it would be naive to expect any transfer of those powers to the central government. However, the federal government might take the initiative in financing the preparation and publication of standard basic Canadian textbooks designed especially for Canadian schools, and the Senate might have a role to play in demonstrating the necessity for, and securing provincial agreement to adopt, such texts in the interest of national unity.

Unfortunately, however, this in itself will not be sufficient, because the most important factor in the classroom is not the textbook but the teacher. It is the teacher who determines how the textbook is used, if at all. It is the teacher who exerts the most influence on attitudes. What is badly needed in Canada with respect to education is a standard course of teacher training and a set of standard basic educational objectives, which are agreed upon and accepted by all provinces, instead of the hodge-podge we now have.

When it comes to teacher training, it must be remembered that Marxist philosophy is prevalent in most institutions of higher learning, not only in Canada but throughout the world, and particularly in the faculties of political science, teacher training and journalism. This influence can be seen in the growing trend for teachers to give up their professional status in preference for unionism. It is to be expected, therefore, that in the course of answering questions or elucidating problems, or of interpreting history and literature, teachers with this background will sometimes unconsciously, if not deliberately, communicate their personal philosophy to their students. I have been informed of cases where teachers are deliberately and openly teaching socialist doctrine in their classrooms and, at the same time, disparaging and undermining our democratic processes and institutions, particularly the Senate.

To a large degree it is the same with journalists. It is natural for them to give priority to those news stories which appeal to their particular background, and to report and interpret them in terms of their philosophy. News stories and commentaries in the printed and electronic media often become the content of classroom projects and discussions, and thus one complements the other.

That is why Premier Lévesque is so confident that time is on his side. It is clear that the intellectual elite of the Parti Québécois are humanists and may be using the humanist cloak to disguise their Marxist philosophy. It is equally clear that the teacher's unions of Quebec are of a strong militant leftist orientation, and that Premier Lévesque and his separatist government control the schools and the content of classroom teaching. They can, therefore, indoctrinate the children in the philosophy required for the kind of socialist state they have in mind.

Premier Lévesque is regarded as a humanist and a humanitarian, but he will not last forever. He may not last very long.

It is quite possible that once he has served his purpose and laid the necessary foundations, more militant elements in his party will wrest power from him and set up a Marxist or even a communist state. That could very well happen even if Quebec decides not to separate from Canada. The only way that can be combatted is by the parents themselves taking a deeper interest in education, and keeping a very close look at what is going on in the classrooms of their province.

Young people leaving high schools and colleges today are more conscious of human dignity than at any previous time in history, and this is true not only in Canada but everywhere in the world. But how can dignity be maintained without work? Having to accept welfare does not do much for human dignity.

It so happens that our crisis of national unity is occurring at a time when the laws of economics have become inoperative. The standard solutions on which we have depended in the past no longer work. To make matters worse, along with the communications gap I referred to earlier, a credibility gap is now being developed. A recent survey showed that only 7 per cent of Canadians had any trust in business leaders, only 5 per cent in government, and only 1 per cent in labour. A survey of students closely parallels these results.

In his excellent speech on May 19, Senator Steuart referred to the British North America Act as a bilingual time bomb. I suggest that the jobless students coming out of schools and colleges today constitute another time bomb, which will explode in due time unless something is done to defuse it. The defusing, however, cannot be done by governments alone. It can be done only if governments, industry and labour are willing to abandon the adversary approach, accept full responsibility for our nation, and work together to put our economic house in order. Only then will we have a sound economic basis for national unity.

I should like to conclude my remarks, honourable senators, by quoting an excerpt from a letter which I recently received from Dr. Paul Campbell, a very dear friend of mine whom some of you have met. Dr. Campbell is a Canadian who is working full time with Moral Re-Armament. He wrote me from London, England:

Our Canadian situation is always central in my heart. I submit the following for your thought and comment:

If we keep feeding ourselves luxuries while others perish for want of necessities, our liberty and affluence will come to an end. The world needs a flood of justice and a torrent of doing good. In the context of the needs of half the earth for food and water, homes and education, it seems to me that anything that divides us and weakens our capacity to help is too self-centred for this age. It is a tremendous task to alleviate the poverty of millions of families, to cool the fires of hate between races which are ripping countries and continents apart.

Why not Quebec lead Canada in a determination and a commitment to bring liberty, food, work, education, participation to the deprived of the earth? Such a human purpose would enlist the best across Canada. Then we will find a purpose and an action worthy of our people, our history, our resources and our future.

For that, we need an enhanced cooperation right across the country, a healthier business life and a healthier political life. It seems to me that some of the best efforts by the best brains fall short, because so often we have no aims beyond the short term. Just as people in our day look back to the 18th century and say, "How could the people of Britain and America allow the slave trade to flourish?", could it be that future generations will look back at us and say, "How could these people strive for their own comforts, security and self-satisfaction, when a billion people did not even have clean water?"

Honourable senators, these words contain much food for thought for all of us. We must realize that if we are going to achieve true, lasting national unity we must first of all make sure that we have the right basis for that unity.

Dr. Campbell's letter reminded me of quotations from two other old friends. One of them was Dr. Frank Buchman, who said:

God is calling men everywhere to be instruments of union. It comes not by conferences, not by laws, not by resolutions and pious hopes, but by change.

The other was George Daneel of South Africa, and he said:

Division comes from fighting for what I think is right. Unity comes from fighting for what God says is right. Everyone can find that unity.

Honourable senators, our Prime Minister in his broadcast of November 24 last reminded us that "our forefathers willed this country into being." The time has come when we must now will it to stay together, and go forward together to achieve Canada's true destiny; to provide a model of inspired democracy of truth and justice, righteousness and freedom for the whole world. In that, every one of us can play a part.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Michaud, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 8 p.m.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-12, to implement conventions between Canada and Morocco, Canada and Pakistan, Canada and Singapore, Canada and the Philippines, Canada and the Dominican Republic and Canada and Switzerland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-54, to amend the Excise Tax Act (No. 2), and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

VISIT TO CANADA DURING SILVER JUBILEE

Senator Haig: Honourable senators, I have a question to ask the Leader of the Government on this, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the accession of Queen Elizabeth to the Throne.

Has the Government of Canada invited the Queen to be present in Canada, and, if so, when?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am sure that all of us in this chamber join in extending to Her Majesty the Queen every good wish on her Silver Jubilee. By way of reply to the honourable senator, I can say that indeed Her Majesty the Queen has been invited to visit Canada, and I can further inform honourable senators that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister will be holding conversations with Her Majesty during the course of the Commonwealth Conference in London with respect to Her Majesty's Canadian itinerary. I can advise honourable senators that it is hoped that Her Majesty, as well as attending other events, can be present to open Parliament in October.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Barring an election.

Senator Langlois: You can have an election before that, if you wish.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill C-47, to amend the Export Development Act.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I am dealing with this bill tonight although it was introduced only yesterday by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West). The reason is that I wish to make whatever contribution I can to the expeditious passage of this legislation, for the very good reason that the Export Development Corporation, to which it refers, is now in a very difficult position through no fault of its own. It is in a position of delaying and, perhaps, compromising some very important export loans to Canadian companies. On the other hand, although the bill appears to be simple and occupies only one printed page containing merely two clauses, it nevertheless has implications far beyond its visible, superficial, apparent simplicity, for a number of reasons.

In the first place, of course, it deals with matters of the greatest importance to the Canadian economy. Secondly, there are indications in the bill of policy decisions which are of great concern to many Canadians. Finally, this bill could well be described as a monumental milestone in the history of Parliament and, particularly, of the Senate. I mentioned the urgency, the delay that has been caused and the problem of the corporation. The fault, of course, as is usually the case when we have these last minute urgencies in this place, lies with the government. First of all it is because of the government's inaction for a long time in connection with this very important problem. Secondly, it is because of the egregious blunder made by the government in attempting to get quick passage through Parliament and in defiance of the rules of Parliament.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) pointed out in an excellent and comprehensive speech that the bill would provide this urgently needed authority for the Export Development Corporation to increase its liability under certain sections of the act, and the predecessor act which still governs it to some extent. The corporation will be authorized to increase its liability in one particular area of its function, that of credit insurance, from in one case, under one group of sections, $750 million to $2.5 billion, and in another from $750 million to $1 billion—a total increase in its authorized liability of $2 billion. All these are in the general area of contracts for credit insurance, and the bill does not deal with the other very large area of the corporation's activity, namely, loans.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) pointed out the importance of the work of the corporation, and there can be no doubt that it is performing a necessary and significant function in the Canadian economy. Canada, as a matter of fact, is just beginning to catch up with many other countries of the world in this area of co-operation and partnership between government and the private sector. Canadian companies face a difficult task in trying to penetrate the export markets of the world. Other countries are way ahead of us in this field. To mention a few: Belgium, the United States, Denmark, The Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Japan, Australia, Finland, Greece, Ireland and New Zealand. Some are a long way ahead of us in initiating this type of thing, while others are beginning to catch up with the initiatives we have taken. The fact is that the demand on Canadian companies for credit financing, credit insurance, in these markets, as the markets open up, is galloping ahead at a tremendous pace. It has been found, of course, that the liability limits previously granted to the corporation are far too low.

The importance to Canada of successful operations in this area is evident when one considers that exports represent one-quarter of our GNP. We are the sixth largest trading nation in the world today. On a per capita basis we would be much higher than number six. On the other hand, we are facing serious problems in this essential area. Traditionally, of course, our export earnings, our export credit balances, have been earned from the export of agricultural products, raw materials and semi-finished products. But we are facing an increasing deficit in the whole field of finished products. In the last five years that deficit has increased from $3.5 billion to over $10 billion estimated for the current year. So, it is a serious problem. For that reason I completely support any measure which will assist the Export Development Corporation in providing support to Canadian firms trying to penetrate these markets, particularly firms in the area of durable goods and services.

As Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) pointed out, the Export Development Corporation operates in three main areas, those being the export credits and guarantees that I have referred to, loans in respect of purchases in Canada involving products or services of 80 per cent Canadian content—durable goods and services—and, finally, certain guarantees against the political risks that can occur from time to time in certain nations where the credit and political stability is in question.

Bill C-47, as I said earlier, deals only with the first of those. We are told that the increases provided in this bill will stabilize the situation as far as the corporation is concerned until the end of 1978, at which time we will be faced, we are told, with a new bill, a bill which will deal with the whole operation of the corporation.

Those honourable senators who are members of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, as Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) said, have followed the development of this corporation over the years, and I have no doubt that the bill, following second reading, will be referred to that committee, and the committee will carry out its deliberations in the manner which has distinguished its deliberations in this important area in the past.

As to the matter of urgency, I am sure honourable senators will recall the recent history of this bill. It is not a happy one. The purpose of the bill before us, in effect, is to correct the egregious blunder of this government in attempting to by-pass Parliament in supplementary estimates (D). As honourable senators will recall, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has for years objected to amendments to legislation being effected through $1 items contained in appropriation bills. After about four or five years of complaints in that regard by the National Finance Committee, and comments in its reports, the other place finally took the matter up. The result, of course, was that the government found that it was behind in its schedule—it had paid no attention, apparently, to the warnings of the corporation, going back to early last fall—and decided that this legislation was necessary to cover up its own delinquency in the matter by attempting to obtain the necessary increases in the liability limits of the corporation through a $1 item in supplementary estimates (D). The Speaker of the other place quite properly ruled that it was out of order for the government to attempt to obtain the liability increases in that fashion. I said that it was an historic and monumental decision in the history of Parliament and one would hope that the government had learned its lesson.

I believe that the minister who introduced the bill, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, was aware of the dangerous ground the government was on. He said "We do not want to do it this way, but I am taking the risk." Well, it turned out to be a very bad risk, because the Speaker in the other place denied the government the right to carry on in that fashion.

Previously, these increases—and there have been increases in the liability ceilings of this corporation—have always been sought and provided for in the normal way; that is, by amendment to a normal act of Parliament.

I hope this may end for at least some time the comment that we sometimes receive here from the other side that an appropriation act is an act of Parliament. Of course it is, but the ruling here—and the lesson I hope the government has learned—is that it is not in order, under the Standing Rules and Orders of the other place, to attempt to use an appropriation bill to amend legislation, particularly legislation of a financial nature. That is why, of course, this bill comes to us with a recommendation from the Governor General in these words:

His Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances, in the manner and amounts and, for the purposes set out in a measure entitled "An Act to amend the Export Development Act".

Which is the bill before us.

Many years ago, when the British government found itself in a blunder of another kind, the great Rudyard Kipling wrote the following lines, which I think are applicable:

We might as well admit it

As a sporting people should

We have had no end of a lesson

And the lesson will do us good.

I hope that this lesson will do the government as much good as some of us on this side of the house hope it will. That may be wishful thinking, but it is appropriate to plead that the government learn its lesson and stop attempting to amend acts of Parliament by $1 items in appropriation acts.

The bill, as I said, deals only with the credit insurance aspects of the functions of the corporation, but any amendment to an act such as this inevitably raises questions about the whole operations of the Export Development Corporation, and we are grateful to Senator Connolly for giving us a complete overview of the operations of that corporation, with particular emphasis on those aspects which are not before us, namely, the loans. These loans, although I am quite sure they are defensible from the point of view of the corporation, in many ways have raised policy questions that are of concern to many Canadians. Many of the loans made under the authority of the act are made directly to other countries, not, as many suppose, to the companies who are seeking to do business with those countries. This, of course, raises in many minds the questions as to why we should be lending money to countries that are rich, many of them far richer than we are. However, we are doing this. Why are we lending money to many Iron Curtain and satellite countries? I cannot think of one that does not have a loan from this corporation.

Another question, of course, is why loans are made to countries whose policies many Canadians, perhaps most Canadians, indeed perhaps all Canadians, regard as inhuman, brutal, and reprehensible by the principles of human decency and human rights. Under this act we are lending money to such countries.

I say immediately that I am asking these questions because they have been asked by others. I am not tonight attempting to give answers, because I do not know the answers. They are extremely difficult questions. The corporation itself can take the position, I think quite rightly, that it is not their business. It would, perhaps, be presumptuous of the corporation to say,

"We will decide which countries Canadian companies should do business with."

That poses the question of the extent to which the government has given the corporation policy directives. I have no information on that, except on perhaps one issue. There has arisen the subject of loans to countries involved in the Arab boycott of Israel. On that we are told that a directive of some sort has been given to the corporation, that its policies must conform to the policies of the government. I do not know how explicit that has been. It would, of course, be meaningless because of the policies of the government towards Iron Curtain countries, and so on, countries such as Chile, even Argentina, towards which the majority of Canadians would have very strenuous objection to the whole complex of the government and its policies.

The other problem that arises is that many of these countries are those that form an important component of the great new markets opening up around the world. We have to consider whether we take a high moral stand on some of these things. Do we take a high political stand or do we do business with them? I can well understand the reluctance of the corporation to establish any policies in this respect, because these rich countries are good markets for our products; we supply the state traders, who are particularly good markets for our finished products, because they themselves are looking for high technology products. The problem is the same there.

Another problem that has been commented on and is of concern to some people is the emphasis in the lending and insurance credits by the corporation to the larger firms. Some 50 Canadian firms at the present time obtain about 60 per cent of all the loans. Here again I raise this only as a question without attempting to answer it, because obviously those 50 firms are the large firms, and are therefore those most likely to be involved in multilateral trade.

• (2030)

The corporation has to some extent compounded its own problems here because it has been unnecessarily secretive. As Senator Connolly emphasized somewhat, with respect to the principle of confidentiality, the evidence seems to be that in some cases at least the corporation has taken this too far. Compared to the United States, for example, we are showing great resistance to giving the public information about the loan practices, the interest rates, and the amounts that have been loaned to the various companies, and so on.

The United States is wide open in this. You can telephone the department in the United States and ask what loan has been given to such-and-such a company and at what interest rate and you will be given the information.

There has been some improvement as a result of the discussion of this bill in the committee of the other place. The corporation finally agreed under questioning—I am glad to say by members of the opposition there, particularly the official opposition—to produce the list of the top 50 corporations which are in receipt of the largest loans. That appears as a schedule in the report of the committee on March 10. Under further pressure the corporation went a step farther and, if honourable senators wish, they will find in the appendix to the proceedings of the Finance, Trade and Economics Committee of the other place another schedule giving the actual amounts of loans and credits in some areas to those 50 largest companies.

This is again a difficult question to answer because in these kinds of negotiations obviously there may be objections on the part of the recipient companies; there may be objections on the part of the corporation to disclose too much information.

On the question of rates, Senator Connolly informed us, and I believe he was quoting the Auditor General, that the borrowing rate for the corporation, where it is in the private sector—and it does borrow in the private sector—runs between $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent and $8\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. He suggested then that the lending rate by the corporation would probably be at least 9 per cent and probably as high as 10 per cent. But the question which has arisen is whether there are loans below that rate. It is understandable that there might be, because the situation which develops in these negotiations is that the buyer, the foreign country, naturally shops round, and it may well say to the prospective Canadian supplier, "The interest rate we are prepared to accept in this deal is not $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent but is 7 per cent, and we can get 7 per cent somewhere else."

It is understandable that such questions arise, but it is not understandable to me that there should be over the long period of time complete secrecy as to the rates. This is something the corporation for its own benefit should seek to improve. I am not suggesting that on the day when it is negotiating the support for a Canadian supplier it should at that time make disclosures; but I do think the Canadian public should, perhaps in an annual report or in some periodic time span, be informed of the rates and of the relationship of the borrowing rate to the lending rate.

On the same question of the emphasis on lending to large firms, there is the complaint of some small businesses that it is difficult for them to get loans. This is so because until very recently the minimum loan which the corporation would grant was at the level of $1 million. That has been changed, and it is now fair to say that the corporation has given evidence and assurances that it will, in the future, place far more importance than it has in the past on the requirements of small business in this export field. The risk element has been criticized; that is, the risk elements in the loans that have been made by the corporation. The Auditor General has raised some questions. On the other hand, the track record of the corporation appears to be very good. As Senator Connolly explained to us, these loans are subject to renegotiation, "rescheduling" is the phrase used. He said there have been no defaults, but I think that depending upon one's definition of the word "default", that might be a questionable statement. I say that, honourable senators, because there are some $61 million in loans that have had to be rescheduled, and a loan that has to be rescheduled is obviously in default. Rescheduling is merely a way to protect the loan after the borrower has defaulted.

On the other hand, the $61 million out of a current total of about $1.3 billion out in loans is a low percentage. So, as I say, the superficial track record of the corporation seems to be very good. But then again there are some serious doubts arising as to the long-term consequences. There have been some recoveries on the $61 million, but I am quite sure that in committee the matter will be raised, and it is to be hoped that the corporation will at least be cautioned that in this particular area they are on dangerous ground. At the same time, let me say again that the evidence is that the corporation is carrying on its business on a strictly commercial basis, much the same as a bank. But there is always a final reckoning in these matters, and one would hope that caution is being exercised by the corporation.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I have drawn attention to some of these questions without attempting to answer them or in general to be critical except in the one area of the incredible inaction and action of the government in creating the situation where the corporation is in this very difficult position. We can recognize the accomplishments of the corporation, and at the same time have some concern about some of the problems that have been raised, particularly these policy problems to which I have referred. We can agree with the urgency of the passage of the legislation and at the same time deplore these actions of the government which have created both the emergency and the urgency.

I understand that the bill will go to committee in due course—perhaps immediately—and will be expeditiously dealt with. For the time being, at least, the corporation will be out of this very difficult position in which it has been placed.

Senator Perrault: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Grosart: Of course.

Senator Perrault: He has alleged that the benefits of Canada's export program are being advanced to countries where there are severe restrictions on human freedom. Would he care to enumerate specifically the names of those countries, in the first place, and secondly, would he care to set forth his suggested criteria which should be applied to those nations with which, in his view, Canada should do business? Thirdly, perhaps the honourable senator would care to name the top ten nations that would qualify according to his criteria.

● (2040)

Senator Grosart: In reply to the Leader of the Government, offhand I can think of Chile, Argentina and Brazil. There may be others. There are certainly extensions of loans to some of the oil exporting countries. In this connection, I think of Algeria, for example. There are a number of them. I think if the honourable senator will inquire himself he will be able to give us the complete list. It is fairly substantial. There might be eight or ten countries in this particular category.

The second part of the government leader's question to me was whether I would provide the criteria for distinguishing between such countries in respect of development corporation loans. The answer is no; that it is not my business.

Senator Perrault: You must have some standards that you would apply, however.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I have no standards that I would attempt to apply. I raised the question, and I made it clear that I do not know the answer. This is entirely a matter for the government, because the government has, or says it has, policies in the sphere of foreign affairs in respect of such countries. It has been clearly announced what the government's stand is in general. Whether the government decides to extend the criteria it uses in denunciations of these countries to policy directives issued to the Export Development Corporation, I do not know. That is for the government to decide. I will not go too far in making or giving gratuitous advice here, except to say that it would be a welcome change if the government did make up its mind on this, as on some other matters.

The leader also asked me whether I would name the top ten countries. The answer, of course, is no. It is clearly up to the government to decide whether it is to be the top two, three, five or ten. I do not make government policy.

Senator Perrault: On a point of clarification, senator, you are saying, for example, that this program should not assist any company which wishes to do business with Brazil, Argentina or Chile. Those are three nations you have named, totally apart from what may be the position of some of our keen competitors in the field of exports or the field of international business.

Senator Grosart: I can only assume that the Leader of the Government was not listening to me, because I said no such thing.

Senator Flynn: It is always the case.

Senator Grosart: I did not suggest for one minute that the corporation should not extend loans to them. I said that it is a question of policy which has to be decided. I made it clear that I do not know the answer, and do not intend to give the answer. I was raising questions that Canadians generally, in various sectors, have raised. I do not know the answers, and I do not intend to say I know. Furthermore, I certainly did not make the statement that the Leader of the Government suggests I made.

Senator Flynn: Do not expect the Leader of the Government to give you the answers.

Senator Langlois: You do not understand the whole program. These loans are not made to the countries, but indirectly to exporters.

Senator Grosart: I now have to say that the deputy leader does not understand the program, because it is very clear that the loans are made to the countries.

Senator Langlois: They are made indirectly to the exporters.

Senator Grosart: They are made to the countries, to the nations, to the governments of these countries.

Senator Langlois: They are made indirectly to the exporters.

Senator Grosart: The deputy leader shakes his head. I hope he will go back and read the record and correct himself.

Senator Langlois: I have read it, and I have read too many of your speeches.

Senator Flynn: Thank God we do not have to read all of yours.

Senator Langlois: You have taken good notice of them.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Connolly speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Flynn: Does it mean we will not hear from Senator Langlois? Very good!

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Grosart for his comments in connection with this bill, and for his obvious desire to have the legislation proceed expeditiously.

On the point that has just recently been discussed, I would say that if honourable senators look at page 15 of the annual report they will see a list of the borrowers who secured loans through the Export Development Corporation in 1976. It is not clear, Senator Grosart, that all these borrowers were countries, by any means.

Senator Grosart: I did not say they were all countries.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): It is clear in certain cases that they were. For example, the People's Republic of the Congo was one of the borrowers. The government of the Republic of Indonesia was a borrower. The Republic of Panama was a borrower, as was the Republic of Turkey. The Bank for Foreign Trade of the U.S.S.R. is obviously a government agency, and was presumably a borrower. It is a little hard, however, upon inspection, to know whether something called the Intercontinental Distilleries (St. Lucia) Limited is the government or not. I should think it would not be, and that it is a corporate borrower, as is Tara Mines Limited.

Senator Grosart referred to an appendix to one of the reports of proceedings of a committee in the other place, in which the corporation listed the large borrowers, or the large applicants, for export credits insurance. I would say that undoubtedly that list was taken from the annual report, because I am informed that all the business done in 1976 is listed on these various pages of the annual report. So, there is really no secret, as far as Parliament is concerned, about the borrowers with which the Export Development Corporation is dealing.

He made a point which was made in the other place, to the effect that the corporation is not dealing, to any great extent, with small firms who are exporters. I think this is so. But I think we are well aware of the interest of small business in Canada in this program, because a great deal of the contracting that is done by exporters with foreign buyers has to be subcontracted to many small businesses or manufacturing organizations, and presumably even service organizations, within Canada. In that way, therefore, I think small business is helped considerably.

Senator Grosart also referred to the fact that while current loans may be earning interest of between 9 per cent and 10 per cent, there are probably other contracts in which the interest rate earned by the corporation is a good deal less than that. I think that is true. I can think, for example, of a situation in which a contract has been running for perhaps five or six years, and it began when the rate was a good deal lower than the 9 per cent or 10 per cent that obtains now.

On the question of default and the rescheduling of loans, I think what Senator Grosart says is true, namely, that when a loan has to be rescheduled, either the borrower is in default or is about to enter default, and, as a result, there may be some problem about the loan. However, I point out that, according to my information, while some $60 million had to be rescheduled by the end of 1976, about $30 million of it at this point in time—that is, June 1977—has been repaid.

Honourable senators, I would like to say one other thing. Last evening I was asked a question as to whether, when loans or export credit policies are approved by order in council, the risk is to the corporation or not. I said I thought the risk might be, first of all, to the corporation, and then to the Consolidated Revenue Fund. I have made inquiries, and I find that, in fact, the risk on order in council loans and export credit contracts is entirely to the Consolidated Revenue Fund. I may add, that while the Export Development Corporation does collect premiums and interest payments on loans made under the programs approved by order in council, those premiums and interest payments are paid by the corporation to the government, subject only to a small service charge.

Honourable senators, if this bill receives second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT AND OTHER ACTS IN RESPECT OF JUDICIAL MATTERS

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for second reading of Bill C-50, to amend the Judges Act and other acts in respect of judicial matters.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am wondering if the applause being given me by the Leader of the Government is a suggestion that my speech should not be critical of the bill. Apparently, some senators don't like criticism from this side of the house.

Senator Langlois: We appreciate it.

Senator Flynn: As long as we don't go too far, you do. If we flatter you at the same time, it all becomes very acceptable.

Senator Langlois: We can go as far as you can.

Senator Flynn: But if we say anything that cuts to the quick, the government leader is up in a flash and in no time has the vocal support of his deputy, who as you know has a bad habit of getting carried away.

Senator Langlois: We work together on this side.

Senator Flynn: Sometimes he says things he doesn't really mean, but we will deal with that in due course.

Senator Langlois: I can go as far as you can but you will never reach this side. You have been trying it for many years.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Order.

Senator Flynn: If we are not reaching your side, it's that what we have to penetrate is just too thick. But we will change sides some day.

Senator Perrault: Did you check your speech with your leader?

Senator Flynn: We don't operate that way in this party. The Leader of the Government has to do that, we know. And on those occasions when he hasn't, he has ended up putting his foot where it didn't fit.

Senator Langlois: Cheap joke.

Senator Flynn: Of course, I can't expect Senator Langlois to see the humor in anything more subtle than slapstick.

Senator Langlois: You can laugh at your own jokes. You are the only one laughing.

Senator Flynn: Many behind you are laughing, senator, but I'm not sure right now whether they are laughing at me or at you.

Now, if I may interrupt all this levity to deal with the bill, I should say that in a very lucid and complete explanation of it last night, Senator McIlraith found it necessary to state—and it has become a tradition in the introduction of bills here—“This bill is not a simple one.” These words are, of course, inspired by that master of the understatement, Senator Laird, whose description of any bill as simple will always mean the kiss of death for that piece of legislation.

I agree that this bill is not a simple one. It is complex. But it is also unimportant. It is merely a housekeeping bill, and there is not much to it. You will remember, of course, that two years ago we passed a bill amending the Judges Act and we made many adjustments. The bill we passed received royal assent on June 19, 1975, which is less than two years ago.

I was interested in the preliminary comment of Senator McIlraith to the effect that there was an increased volume of work in the courts—federal courts or courts presided over by federally appointed judges. That is due to the increased volume of legislation. The Canadian Bar, expert observers of the political scene, the general public, all have warned us against trying to legislate in every area of human endeavour. We are going too far in this field, with the consequence that there is a tendency today to give quasi judicial bodies the task of settling a lot of litigation. This is true at the federal level and it is true in many areas of provincial jurisdiction. This is the tendency that has become obvious in Quebec, for instance, where eventually practically all conflicts will be settled by administrative bodies. This is because they have gone too far in trying to control by law every area of human activity. When I am speaking of Quebec, of course, I am referring to the bill that deals with automobile insurance in that province. Conflicts will be solved by an administrative body and no one will have any real recourse to the judiciary. Before too long, this overwork of our courts may be alleviated to some extent if the tendency that I am speaking of is generalized across Canada. But I submit that that would be a dangerous course to follow.

Let us come now to the unimportant parts of this bill. First, we are adjusting the salary of judges. I remember two years ago when we discussed the bill amending the Judges Act we were told that the adjustment to the salaries which was to take place starting April 1, 1974, would raise the salaries of the puisne judges appointed federally from $42,500 to $50,000 the next year and that that would remain constant until this year; a three-year period, in other words. I just wanted to mention that because when we passed this bill we were told not to worry, that the judges' salaries would be frozen for three years. As I said earlier, the bill received royal assent on June 19, 1975 and a few months later, when the government made its about face in connection with freezing wages and salaries, the Prime Minister in his statement to the nation said that the salaries of judges appointed federally were to be frozen. They had already been frozen, so the government was freezing something frozen.

I know that the three years have now elapsed and it is time to do something with respect to these salaries. We are adjusting them from April 1 of this year by $2,000, giving the judges $52,000, which is exactly 4 per cent and certainly well below the guidelines. Next year on April 1 we are to give them another $2,000, which will amount to approximately 3.06 per cent, or a little more—not an exaggerated amount. I have always said that the type of judiciary we have in this country deserves a lot of protection and we should do everything to keep it as it is. Therefore, we have no criticism at all to offer with respect to the increase in salary granted to the judges under this legislation.

The second point, which is not very important—now, I see my friend, Senator Marchand, smiling. I hope that one of these days he will seek to interrupt me. I look forward to that occasion with gleeful anticipation. He is no doubt endeavouring to learn from Senator Langlois how best to do it, I therefore understand his hesitancy.

Senator Langlois: He is being "deep frozen" by you this time.

Senator Flynn: I doubt it. That couldn't easily happen to Jean Marchand.

The second point I want to make is with respect to the number of judges. The legislation increases the number of judges of the superior court in many provinces, or supreme court, if you wish. It provides for five additional puisne judges of the superior court in Quebec. I wonder, and maybe we will be given the answer in committee, whether the government of Quebec or the National Assembly has adopted or agreed to adopt supplementary legislation in this respect. As you know, there must be a sort of agreement by legislative process on the part of the provincial government. And if my information is correct, this has not yet been done in Quebec. Parliament will be invited to add five puisne judges to the number of superior court judges of Quebec. However, it would mean nothing unless the National Assembly by means of a bill presented by the government adopts the necessary legislation.

The most important part of the bill as far as Senator McIlraith is concerned is that part dealing with the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs under clause 44 of the bill. He said in his remarks last evening, and I quote from page 824 of the Debates of the Senate:

However, in some of the other courts—

He was making reference earlier to the Federal Court.

—there is quite an increase as well, and we have the anomalous situation that the main litigant, or party before the court, the Department of Justice, has the responsibility for handling the administrative affairs of the federally constituted court, and the administrative affairs relating to the federally appointed judiciary; that is, their salaries, annuities, leave of absence, and other related matters. This anomaly of having the main litigant with the dual role of appearing before the court, presumably to have a wholly impartial and independent judgment rendered by a judge, at the same time as it has administrative responsibility for the judiciary, is something that requires attention. The bill deals directly with this point.

In other words, the sponsor of the bill suggested that there might be a sort of conflict of interest, or conflict of responsibilities within the Department of Justice. We have dealt with that in another debate, on the report of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I do not believe, however, that in the perspective that the sponsor had yesterday the problem is as important as he has enunciated, because I would suggest that outside of the Federal Court the Department of Justice is not the main litigant. It is very seldom that such litigation arises, and I wish to say that in my opinion the emphasis on that is not really justified by the facts. In any event, taking this as the basis for the amendments which are proposed in clause 44 and following of this bill, I would say that we are not doing much.

Presently, the problem of dealing with administrative matters with respect to the courts to which the judges are appointed federally is the responsibility of the Minister of Justice, since it is the duty of an official of the department. All we are doing as far as these courts are concerned is creating the position of Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs, who has the rank of deputy minister but is under the Minister of Justice. We are simply creating another job, which may give some authority to this person but does not take away anything from the Minister of Justice, who is still the minister responsible for this Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs. So, it is simply an administrative solution and does not deal at all with the problem indicated or suggested by the sponsor of the bill, a problem which, in my opinion, the sponsor has grossly exaggerated. It may be practical, but it does not touch the principle at all. If at the level of the Supreme Court of Canada the responsibility for these administrative matters is given to the registrar, it means only that the registrar, of course, will be acting under the supervision of the Chief Justice. At the same time, he will be an official of the Department of Justice.

On the whole, I think it is all really unimportant. It does not solve the basic problem underlined by the sponsor of the bill. It may solve administrative problems, but that is all. I look forward to committee consideration of this bill to see whether or not my perspective of this change is correct. From my reading of the bill, and my knowledge of the present situation, I do not think this will bring about any drastic changes, except in a mere administrative way.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I have been absent from the chamber for several days. This bill came to my attention for the first time this evening. I am afraid I must disagree with both the sponsor of the bill and my honourable friend opposite as to the relative insignificance or housekeeping nature of the bill. I suspect that there is more to the bill than meets the eye. Accordingly, I should like to have an opportunity to study it further. For that reason, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Lang, debate adjourned.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT SATISFIED SECURITIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—SECOND READING

Hon. Charles McElman moved the second reading of Bill C-8, to amend the Financial Administration Act and to repeal the Satisfied Securities Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I will not attempt to mislead you by use of what is now known as the "Laird classic", and tell you that Bill C-8 is a simple bill. I am sure you have all grasped that it is complicated and complex. I am entirely confident, however, that my lucid explanation of its provisions will reduce its complexity to simplicity itself.

The bill comprises two short clauses. Its purpose is to expedite the discharge of securities taken by Her Majesty in the form of liens, mortgages, hypothecs, privileges or other charges, once the debts for which such securities were taken have been satisfied.

These discharges are presently effected under a cumbersome and time-consuming procedure set out in the Satisfied Securities Act, whereby the Governor in Council may effect the discharge of a satisfied security through the passage of an order in council. The elimination of orders in council for that purpose would substantially reduce the time required to effect a discharge. The bill proposes that the authority to give a discharge of a satisfied security be conferred on the minister responsible for the administration of the security.

The bill further provides that the authority be included in the Financial Administration Act, with the Satisfied Securities Act being repealed. This would incorporate the authority to discharge satisfied securities in the major piece of legislation dealing directly with government financial administration, while eliminating a small and rather insignificant statute.

The securities which would be subject to the provisions of this bill are those taken directly by Her Majesty and not those taken by crown agents, such as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the Farm Credit Corporation. Those corporations are now empowered to issue a simple discharge of mortgage. The majority of securities which would require discharge under this bill are those taken by Her Majesty to secure loans made from the Indian Economic Development Fund and the Indian Off-Reserve and Eskimo Housing Program, which are administered by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as well as those falling under the provisions of the Veterans Land Act. The loans in question number in the many thousands each year.

Although the bill is short, its enactment is of importance to the efficient administration of various government loan programs which benefit many thousands of Canadians.

I commend the bill to honourable senators for their approval.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, as Senator McElman has explained, this is a "simple" bill. Its simplicity is so obvious that one wonders why we did not do this long ago.

Grant Glassco, who headed the commission investigating government services, recommended that this practice be abandoned. It is time his recommendation was acted upon. Tonight is the night.

The trouble is that cabinet is inundated with these orders in council. When an Indian gets a discharge of his mortgage, there is great formality about it. As my honourable friend knows, an order in council has to be drafted, and the cabinet has to take action on it.

I remember one of my jobs in times past was to act as chairman of a subcommittee. After the cabinet meeting each day we would spend hours in getting these orders in council ready for recommendation to cabinet. The cabinet would act on them the following day. This simply cuts down a very involved process and makes the matter a simple one.

As my honourable friend has said, the passage of this measure would do away with the Satisfied Securities Act, and substitute therefor an amendment to the Financial Administration Act, and that amendment is set out very clearly.

There are so many areas of government where consideration should be given to methods of cutting down the tremendous amount of work involved in doing simple things. A discharge granted to an Indian at the present time is exactly the same as an ordinary discharge. Why should the cabinet be troubled with something about which it knows nothing of the detail? Why should it not be left to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

• (2120)

The honourable sponsor has explained this bill succinctly and simply, and I suggest that all members of this house should be very much in favour of its terms.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is the honourable senator going to speak now?

Senator McElman: I was going to thank Senator Walker for his assistance in respect of this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: If the Honourable Senator McElman speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I appreciate the assistance of Senator Walker. He is always helpful, particularly to me.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McElman moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL UNITY

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault, calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

Hon. Hervé J. Michaud: Honourable senators, in the course of his speech in this debate on May 30, Senator Côtteau said:

However, I would be less than truthful if I were to insinuate in any manner that the Acadians of Nova Scotia are completely devoid of sympathy for those in Quebec who strive to protect their own cultural and linguistic rights. Having themselves experienced the erosion of their culture over the years, they recognize the need and the wisdom of the French majority in Quebec establishing now sound basic principles which will safeguard their culture in the years ahead.

I wish to indicate in that regard that the Acadians of New Brunswick have shared the same difficulties and now entertain the views and the objectives of the Acadians of Nova Scotia.

[Translation]

In New Brunswick, the Acadians make up 38 per cent of the population of the province. Like those elsewhere in the country, they are aware that a people can develop only if it can control by itself all aspects of its development.

Before going any further, it may be a good idea to answer one question: Who do we call the Acadians or who are the Acadians?

Generally, the name "Acadian" is given to French-speaking people who lives in the maritime provinces or who are native maritimers. The same name can also be applied to the descendants of those who inhabited ancient Acadia. According to this definition, there are about half a million Acadians in Louisiana, 200,000 in New England and certainly about 100,000 in Quebec and Ontario. There are about 240,000 in New Brunswick, 12,000 in Prince Edward Island, and 80,000 in Nova Scotia.

It is not simply a whim for Acadians to claim to be a special group within the Canadian Confederation. This assertion has historical foundations which go back to the very beginnings of the colony and is supported by sociological factors which have been felt for at least one hundred years.

Indeed, under the French regime, Acadia was a province completely separate from the province of Canada. It had its own governors appointed directly by the King of France and, from all the aspects of civil administration, it was completely separate from what was then called Canada. Between 1613 and 1710, Acadia changed hands half a dozen times. It was with the capture of Port Royal in 1710 that the rather sensitive system of "French neutrals", which ended in the deportation of 1755, started for the Acadians.

The great move was probably the major event in the history of Acadia. Approximately 12,000 of a total population of about 16,000 were deported and left along the New England coast down to the southern part of the United States. In Prince Edward Island, the deportation took place in 1758. On the island, the number of deported people reached 3,000 and only a few hundreds were left.

The approximately 1,000 Acadians who escaped in 1755 hid in the woods. However, certain groups succeeded in getting established, especially in southern and northern New Brunswick and they laid the foundations for several Acadian parishes, like Memramcook, Caraquet, St. Basile, the village of Richibouctou, and so on.

However, the deportees could not find suitable refuge in the British colonies and hundreds of them assembled in groups to travel on foot through the woods the whole distance that separated them from their country of origin.

Thus the Acadian colony, which was believed gone for ever, slowly re-established its structures, especially in the area now called New Brunswick.

Not much is known about the Acadians during the century which followed deportation. That dark age, as many historians have called it, prompted Father Casgrain to write that the greatest misfortune of the Acadians had not been deportation, but the complete intellectual relinquishment in which they had found themselves for a century.

Around 1860, about 45,000 Acadians in New Brunswick were fighting laboriously for a decent survival. They were poor, they had no leaders, no professionals, no educated people and, as clergy, one priest of their group and six French-Canadian missionaries. There was no organization, no moral unity then among the Acadian community. What was lacking most was education and the means to procure it.

That serious shortcoming was soon palliated by the founding of the Collège Saint-Joseph by the Pères de Sainte-Croix in 1864. Over the years, they were joined by the Eudists and several religious communities of women. After some years, young leaders came out of those institutions, conscious of their responsibilities and fully determined to take them. In 1881, in Memramcook, the first general convention of the Acadians took place, during which the representatives of the people chose a patroness, Our Lady of the Assumption, and a national holiday, Assumption Day, which is celebrated on August 15. Three years later, the second convention of Acadians took place at Miscouche, in Prince Edward Island, and chose as the Acadian flag the French three-colour flag with the yellow star of Mary over the blue, and as national anthem, the Ave Maris Stella.

The Acadians are a people who are back on their feet again. Today, they have their own Francophone university, with three campuses; a developing technological institute; a daily, L'Évangéline; weeklies; a radio and television station; a complete network of French schools. Those institutions are well supported by patriotic and social organizations, such as the Société nationale des Acadiens, the Société acadienne du Nouveau-Brunswick, which in turn are members of the Fédération des francophones hors Québec.

One of the most efficient levers of the economic revival of Acadia was and remains cooperation. The fierce spirit of independence and individualism of the Acadian people has often been mentioned. The element of truth in the accusation finds an explanation in its tragic history. Scattered here and there and everywhere for generation after generation, the Acadians isolated themselves, and inevitably their dispersal all over the world could only develop a multitude of mentalities, as many sources of friction and misunderstanding when the time comes to regroup and work as a team.

In spite of it all, the deep faith and authentic Christian charity which remained the essence of the Acadian soul managed to overcome all obstacles, so that today that small people is in the process of securing its economic emancipation thanks to the practice of cooperation in all its forms. The caisses populaires, the producers and consumers cooperatives, the Mutuelle l'Assomption, are the main pillars of its development.

Up to this point, I have spoken to you of the achievements of the Acadians for themselves. But, in a province such as ours, one just has to see the difficulties that can be encountered when it comes to developing the Acadian areas both economically and culturally.

On looking at the social and economic picture of New Brunswick, one realizes that the province comprises two vast economic regions, one in the south and the west, industrialized and rich; the other, to the north and the east, underdeveloped and poorer. The latter, that is, the one where we find the lowest incomes, the more modest investments, the highest rates of unemployment, social welfare and emigration, the worst means of communication and the lowest rate of education, is the territory where the vast majority of Francophones in the province live.

In the area of public administration it is practically impossible to determine the level of the Acadian participation in the federal public service. The sheer number of federal public servants presents a major obstacle to anyone attempting an assessment in this respect.

However, it is possible to give a few figures on the Acadian presence in the provincial public service. We will limit our study of the Acadian presence at the senior official level, that is, the policy-making level.

The total number of deputy minister or equivalent positions in the provincial public service is 21. Among those, six are currently held by Francophones, or Acadians, and 15 by Anglophones.

The guide of services, programs and staff of the provincial public service gives a list of senior officials. They are for the most part directors of different divisions within the provincial departments. That list covers 190 people. Among those, only 24 are Francophones. Of those 24, seven are with the Department of Fisheries, and seven with the Department of Education. This means that there are only ten French-speaking senior officials in the 27 other departments and government agencies mentioned in the guide.

There are no French-speaking senior officials in the following eight departments: Municipal Affairs, Commerce and Development, Finance, Health, Social Services, Justice, Tourism and Transport. Those eight departments alone contain a total of 62 senior officials, and there is not a single French-speaking official—they are all English-speaking.

In addition, there are 13 officials in the higher echelons of the Department of Labour and Manpower, and only one of them is French-speaking. The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development has 12 directors, including only two who are French-speaking.

The absence of Acadians in the higher echelons of the public service is to say the least terribly disturbing. That phenomenon is disturbing not only because those who currently influence government policies are for the most part indifferent to the Acadian fact, but also because the outlook for the future is bleak.

Those who are now categorized as higher echelon officials are probably the deputy minister and assistant deputy ministers of tomorrow. The vertical promotion system is a reality throughout any organization. The situation is therefore unlikely to improve, unless the government sets up a special employment and promotion policy for higher echelon civil servants.

This guide provides interesting information on the boards affiliated to the various departments and government agencies. These include marketing boards, advisory councils and standing commissions. Of the 48 people who carry out the duties of chairmen or executive directors, whether on a part or full-time basis, only four are Francophones.

You will understand now why Acadians in New Brunswick must fight constantly for their identity. There are hardly any of them in a decision-making position.

Certain quarters sometimes demonstrate hostile feelings towards Acadians.

In this regard, we refer honourable senators to the unbelievable reaction of a number of Fredericton citizens when the federal and provincial authorities jointly announced the construction of a French community center in this capital. Judging from this reaction, there would be no room for New Brunswick Acadians in their own capital.

Besides, who has not heard of the hard times meted out to the Acadian population of the City of Moncton under a certain municipal administration that will not fade too quickly from our memory? This type of petty attitude will have to disappear in New Brunswick if we want to convince Francophones elsewhere in our country that Canada is their home wherever they go, wherever they are.

In the debate now taking place before the citizens of our country two great issues can be identified, namely, the preservation of the minority language across the country, and the political independence of the Province of Quebec. Regarding the language issues, one cannot fail to notice that according to a recent poll made on behalf of the Parti Québécois, the results of which were published in Le Devoir on Saturday, May 20, 65 per cent of Francophones in Quebec support, without reservations, the language bill introduced in the province; 27 per cent support it with certain reservations on one or several aspects.

This is just a poll. Nevertheless, the fact remains undisputed. Throughout the country, Francophones feel the need for a more efficient protection against the threat of assimilation.

Mr. Claude Ryan, director of the Montreal daily Le Devoir, stated in Charlottetown on June 5, that "the language issue is fundamental". As to the issue of independence one cannot but hope that it will be solved through the settlement of the difficult situations that are at the roots of that movement.

Senator Frith: Will Senator Michaud allow me to ask him a question?

Senator Michaud: Please do.

Senator Frith: To begin with, I wish to congratulate you for your speech based on factual and very educational background material.

If you will allow me, honourable senator, I wish to ask you a question regarding the Parti Acadien. You mentioned various organizations that represent the interests of the Acadians. Is there any benefit we can draw from your own experience and from your appraisal of the relative importance of that party with respect to the expectations of the Acadians?

Senator Michaud: In answer to your question, I would say that the same question has already been put to a prominent member of the Acadian community and his answer was that the Parti Acadien constitutes an experience with a social aspect and that it probably equalled many others of the kind undertaken in the past. From a strictly political view point, however, I find it a rather ambitious experience, given the fact that the Acadians are only a minority in New Brunswick.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the adjournment of the house I should like to make a request. I ask that the order for the second reading of Bill C-25 be placed first after third readings, if any, on tomorrow's Order of the Day. I make this request on behalf of Senator Goldenberg who, because of illness in his family, may be called home early tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 8, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Report of the Anti-Inflation Board, dated May 31, 1977, to the Governor General in Council, pursuant to section 17(2) of the Anti-Inflation Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, reporting its reference to the Administrator of the said Act of proposed changes in compensation agreed upon in the collective agreement between 97 Member Cartage Companies, who bargain in association through Transport Labour Relations, and Teamster Local Unions 31 and 213.

Copies of report to the Minister of National Health and Welfare from the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee on categorical drop-out under CPP for child rearing, dated May 1977.

Report of operations under the Crop Insurance Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1976, pursuant to section 13 of the said Act, Chapter C-36, R.S.C., 1970.

CLERESTORY OF THE SENATE CHAMBER

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Clerestory of the Senate Chamber, and I would ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 852)

The Clerk Assistant (Reading): On January 29th, 1975, the Senate approved a motion—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Senator Flynn: How many pages?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): There are 16 or 17 pages in the report. I do not think it should be read now, but I hope honourable senators will read it, perhaps over the weekend.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration on Monday next, should we so sit.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

ADDITION TO COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), that the name of the Honourable Senator Stanbury be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Flynn: We need him badly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND (No. 2)—THIRD READING

Senator Hayden moved the third reading of Bill C-54, to amend the Excise Tax Act (No. 2).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT SATISFIED SECURITIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—THIRD READING

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Walker, the third reading of Bill C-8, to amend the Financial Administration Act and to repeal the Satisfied Securities Act.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg moved the second reading of Bill C-25, to extend the present laws in Canada that proscribe discrimination and that protect the privacy of individuals.

He said: Honourable senators, as one long concerned with the matter of human rights, it gives me great satisfaction to be in a position to move second reading of this bill. It is a very important bill and, in my opinion, one which is long overdue. It serves two major purposes. It provides for the first time a comprehensive anti-discrimination code at the federal level, and it extends for the first time the right to Canadian citizens to obtain access to personal information about them in government files.

The basic principles of the bill are set out in clause 2. Paragraph 2(a) provides that:

every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have, consistent with his or her obligations as a member of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex or marital status, or conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted or by discriminatory employment practices based on physical handicap.

Under the provisions of paragraph 2(b):

the privacy of individuals and their right of access to records containing personal information concerning them for any purpose including the purpose of ensuring accuracy and completeness should be protected to the greatest extent consistent with the public interest.

These, honourable senators, are principles basic to Canadian society. They are principles as fundamental as freedom itself. Upon such principles rests the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family.

Although these principles are basic and the freedoms they embody have been set out in such landmark documents as the English Bill of Rights of 1689, the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen, the Bill of Rights in the United States Constitution, and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 1948, there is at present no overall protection of these freedoms at the federal level in Canada. While all provinces have enacted laws respecting human rights in relation to discriminatory practices, there is no act of Parliament which comprehensively prohibits discriminatory conduct by private individuals, corporations or government within the federal jurisdiction.

The basic principle of freedom from discrimination is set out in the Canadian Bill of Rights of 1960, a document of increasing stature and importance in this country. However, while the Bill of Rights enunciates this principle and provides for its application by courts and officials in interpreting federal laws, it does not set standards for behaviour nor impose any sanctions for violation of the principle.

Honourable senators may also recall that in 1968, the present Prime Minister, while Minister of Justice, proposed to a Federal-Provincial Constitutional Conference that we adopt in Canada a constitutional charter of human rights which would be binding on both Parliament and the provincial legislatures. This was an undertaking with which I had some involvement as special counsel on the Constitution at that time. I well remember the problems which were encountered subsequently in trying to reach agreement with the provinces on the specifics of constitutional guarantees for human rights. Some fundamental rights were proposed finally for inclusion in the Constitution by the Victoria Charter of 1971. But that, of course, failed to receive unanimous provincial support.

Subsequently, the Government of Canada reviewed federal laws to see what more it could do within its jurisdiction to enhance the protection of human rights. At the present time there is no federal legislation which provides protection against discrimination by persons providing goods, services, facilities or accommodation in the federally regulated area. This means, for example, that a black who is refused credit by a bank solely because the bank manager does not like his colour probably has no legal means of redress.

I should point out that federal law provides some protection against discrimination in employment. Part I of the Canada Labour Code, which deals with fair employment practices and applies to employment by banks, railways, airlines, and others under the jurisdiction of Parliament, prohibits discrimination in employment practices on some grounds. However, that code does not cover discrimination based on age, sex, marital status, conviction for which a pardon has been granted or physical handicap. Nor does it apply to employment within the public sector. Consequently, the many thousands of persons employed by the crown in the right of Canada cannot seek protection under the anti-discrimination provisions of the Canada Labour Code. While the Public Service Employment Act does set out anti-discrimination standards to be followed by the Public Service Commission in dealing with employees and prospective employees, the existing protection against discrimination for public servants is of very limited nature and effect.

As honourable senators are undoubtedly aware, such federal anti-discrimination legislation as now exists is both fragmented and incomplete. There are, consequently, significant lapses in the legal protection to which Canadians are entitled and which they deserve. There are significant gaps, for example, in the legal protection offered to the many women of Canada whose careers are seriously limited by sexism in employment practices, or to members of the many minority groups for whom the relentless pressure of discrimination is too often a reality.

Many Canadians are not aware of or do not want to face up to the fact that we have a problem in this country with racial and other forms of discrimination. And yet anyone who reads the newspapers must be disturbed by the increasing number of accounts of nasty racial incidents. I suggest that it is no longer enough that we merely express our distaste and concern for the problem; it is time that we enacted protection for minority groups into the law.

Honourable senators, I am not suggesting that a single piece of legislation will wipe out racism and discrimination overnight or change the deep-seated social attitudes, prejudices and hatreds which are associated with discrimination. I do suggest, however, that enactment of the bill before us will represent a significant and positive step towards that goal. It will be symbolic of this country's commitment to uphold tolerance. It will provide legal protection to those who suffer discrimination, and perhaps, most importantly, it will provide a mechanism for actively promoting greater tolerance and respect for the dignity of all Canadians.

Canada has been in the forefront of support at the international level in the campaign to protect individual rights and freedoms. Nearly 30 years ago Canada joined with the other members of the United Nations to approve the universal declaration of human rights, and has since acceded to several other instruments of the subject of human rights, most recently the Helsinki Agreement.

I am confident honourable senators will agree that we must also recognize our responsibilities in this area at the domestic level and put into law and practice within the federal jurisdiction a clear commitment to equality of opportunity and protection from discrimination.

The Canadian Human Rights Bill is designed to provide that clear commitment and to provide at long last the comprehensive body of law now lacking at the federal level, a body of law to which all Canadians will be able to resort. It will also provide for an independent commission to administer the law and to advance in various ways the cause of human rights.

The anti-discrimination provisions of the bill are contained in Parts I, II and III. Part I identifies the following to be prohibited grounds of discrimination: race; national or ethnic origin; colour; religion; age; sex; marital status; conviction for which a pardon has been granted; and, in employment matters, physical handicap. This, honourable senators, represents the largest and most comprehensive list of prohibited grounds in any anti-discrimination legislation in Canada or in the United States at either the federal or state level. In developing this list an effort was made generally to include only those grounds which had been included in anti-discrimination legislation in the Canadian provinces and in the United States at the federal and state levels. This is because of a concern that the Human Rights Commission in its early years will have considerable demands on its time and should not have to face an impossible workload. Because of the approach adopted, the commission will be able to draw on the experience and precedents developed in these other jurisdictions. However, if the commission feels that these grounds should be expanded in the future, it can recommend to Parliament that that be done.

With respect to protection against racism, the bill contains a measure proscribing the dissemination of hate over the telephone. This applies to repeated hate messages sent over federally regulated telephones. It is included in order to deal with a serious problem being faced in some parts of this country, particularly in the Toronto area. It is intended to supplement the hate message provision in the Criminal Code, section 281.2, which has not proved to be adequate for dealing with the problem. While more rigorous than section 281.2, it has been drafted carefully so as to avoid unjustifiable interference with legitimate expression of opinion.

• (1430)

The bill prohibits discrimination on any of the prohibited grounds in the provision of services, facilities or accommodation, in the provision of commercial premises or residential accommodation and, subject to certain necessary exceptions, in employment and employment application advertisements.

It prohibits trade unions from discriminating in membership or in the advantages to be derived therefrom, and discrimination by employees or unions in training or any other matter related to employment.

The bill declares, in clause 11(4), that "sex does not constitute a reasonable factor justifying a difference in wages," and also requires that there be equal pay for work of equal value.

Senator Flynn: For sex?

Senator Goldenberg: I am going to let the Leader of the Opposition put that question in committee when the bill is referred to it.

The new formula is the equal pay formula adopted by the 1951 convention of the International Labour Organization which was ratified by Canada in 1972, and recommended in the 1970 report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. It will be the first time that this formula, significant because it introduces the concept of work of equal value, will be used in Canadian law to express equal pay requirements. The Canada Labour Code and legislation in the provinces generally require equal pay for the same or similar work. This traditional formula does not allow for consideration of the value of the work being performed. As the women's organizations in this country have pointed out, this results in a serious inadequacy. The "same or similar" formula can do nothing about low-paying female "job ghettos" arising from the fact that many women are never given the opportunity to do the same work as men, so that a lower pay scale for them is possible. The equal value formula is being proposed so that where there is this kind of segregation, there will have to be a realistic assessment of the value of the work done by women to ensure that it is compensated adequately.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Goldenberg: Through the introduction of this new formula, which will allow the effort, skill, responsibility and conditions of work of two different jobs, one performed by a woman and the other by a man, to be compared, it is expected that the discrepancy in pay received by men and women will be narrowed.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Goldenberg: I am interested to see what we are going to face in committee hearings as a result of this new formula.

Part II of the bill establishes the Canadian Human Rights Commission consisting of a chief commissioner, a deputy chief commissioner and not less than three or more than six other members. It will be an independent body, its members removable only by the Governor in Council on address by the Senate and House of Commons. The commission will be responsible for administering the act and will have extensive powers to issue binding guidelines and regulations. It will also be entrusted with a significant educational, research and information role. It may establish up to 12 regional offices and operate through "divisions"; that is, panels of less than the full commission.

Part III of the bill sets out the procedure for dealing with a complaint. The experience of the provinces and of other jurisdictions with anti-discrimination legislation, which has been very useful in developing this part, has shown that a procedure which involves remedies of a civil type rather than criminal law remedies and which emphasizes a conciliatory rather than an adversary approach is by far the most successful way to deal with problems arising from discriminatory practices. Subject to a small number of exemptions, the bill provides that all complaints filed with the commission must be investigated. If the matter is not settled during the investigation stage—and the experience in the provinces has indicated that a large number of complaints will be settled during this stage—the commission will be able to refer the matter either to conciliation or directly to a Human Rights Tribunal for adjudication. The tribunal, to be chosen from a panel of members, can order that the discriminatory practice cease and that compensation be provided to the victim. It will be seen that under Part III the emphasis is clearly on reconciling differences and compensating injuries, not on retribution.

I would now like to turn to a different aspect of the bill, Part IV. Under this part, Canadians will for the first time be given a right of access to personal information concerning them kept in government records. They will also be given the right to request correction of that information where it is not felt to be accurate, and a right to control the use of the information. In addition, Part IV provides for a mechanism to control and co-ordinate the collection of information and the creation of new information banks.

As honourable senators are aware, the matter of access to government records is not a uniquely Canadian issue: it is a problem faced by most highly developed societies. If this bill is approved, it will be the first time that such legislation will have been enacted in Canada.

Other western countries, such as the United States, Sweden and West Germany, have enacted legislation of this type, and in the preparation of Part IV, the legislation and experience of these countries have been carefully studied. Part IV has been developed to adapt this concept in a parliamentary democracy and to give Canadians the widest possible access to information, and firm safeguards consistent with our parliamentary system and the interest of the public as a whole.

I would like to make it clear that Part IV is not intended to be, or to be a substitute for, freedom of information legislation. While freedom of information deals with the access of the public to government documents in general, Part IV provides a mechanism for an individual to see his own file. It is true that the two concepts, one which has been referred to as "the right to privacy" and the other as "the right to know," are related. They are, however, different.

As far as freedom of information is concerned, I am advised that a policy paper on this matter is presently being prepared and will be presented soon to the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. The matter can then be studied with a view to developing legislation on methods of improving public access to government information.

It has, of course, not been possible under Part IV to grant individuals an unrestricted right of access to personal information, because account had to be taken of the public interest and the privacy of other individuals. Consequently, exceptions to the general principle have had to be included covering disclosure of information which might be injurious to international relations, national defence or security, or federal-provincial relations, or which has been obtained in the course of investigations pertaining to the detection of crime and to particular offences against an act of Parliament. Where, in the opinion of the minister responsible for an information bank, information is classified as falling within sensitive categories of information set out in the bill, the minister can limit the disclosure requirements which apply to that bank or restrict the right of access to that information bank or to certain information within it. Where the exception applies to a whole information bank, the minister's decision must be approved by the Governor in Council.

Part IV provides for a review procedure for an individual who feels that his or her rights under that Part have been infringed. Such a person can take his case to the Privacy Commissioner, who will sit as a special member of the Human Rights Commission. The Privacy Commissioner will be an ombudsman-like official, with extensive powers of investigation and reporting, but without the power to enforce his decision.

In providing for this type of review procedure, it is felt that the objectives adopted in developing an effective mechanism for review have been met. Review by the Privacy Commissioner will establish a procedure that will be easily accessible for all individuals, will be expeditious and will not prove to be prohibitively expensive for either the individual or taxpayers of Canada.

Responsibility for the final decision is left with the minister. The decisions being made by ministers regarding exemptions from disclosure requirements and rights of access are essentially of a policy nature involving the balancing of certain risks and probabilities involving the public interest. Consequently, it is felt that in our system of parliamentary democracy the responsibility for such decisions should remain with the minister who will be accountable for them to Parliament and ultimately to the electorate. Review by the Privacy Commissioner should, however, provide an effective check on the use of this power by ministers, since under the bill the commissioner must report to Parliament every case in which a minister refuses to act on his recommendation.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize once again the importance of this legislation. It provides a clear and concise statement of rights which are basic to Canadian society, and which every citizen of Canada should enjoy. In this sense, enactment of this bill will have a symbolic value. However, the bill is also a functional piece of legislation, providing both a mechanism to deal effectively with cases of discrimination when they occur and a mechanism to promote the respect for these basic values amongst all Canadians, and so to reduce the number of incidents of discrimination in the future. It also, as I said, provides a right in law for citizens to obtain access to personal information on them held by the government and to control the accuracy and use of that information.

The bill is detailed and I am certain honourable senators will want clarification of some clauses. Accordingly, if it receives second reading, I will propose that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for further examination.

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Do we have any assurance from the law officers of the Crown on the constitutionality of the bill, or are we taking our future chances in that regard?

Senator Goldenberg: My answer to that question is quite simple. The bill will apply only within the federal jurisdiction. It is therefore constitutional.

Senator Molson: I wonder if my colleague will permit a further question? Would he perhaps add a few words to explain to those of us with no legal background at all where the impact of this legislation will cease and where provincial legislation will apply? At this moment, hearing the proposals in this legislation, which is sweeping and highly desirable, I cannot help but think that in Ontario at the moment we have an incident where a man appeals for trial in French and it is refused. I cannot help but think that every day in the newspapers in my province, Quebec, it is said that a bill presently before the Quebec Legislature is contrary to the Charter of Human Rights. Would the honourable senator mind explaining how this sophisticated legislation is going to protect all Canadians against situations that arise in the areas in which they live?

Senator Goldenberg: The honourable senator, in the examples he gave, referred to discrimination on the basis of language. That is a touchy question. He may have noticed that the prohibitions in the bill are against discrimination on the basis of:

—race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex or marital status, or conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted or by discriminatory employment practices based on physical handicap.

There is no mention of language in this bill. I posed the same question when I was asked to move second reading. It was felt that there is an Official Languages Act administered by the Official Languages Commissioner; that it is a special act dealing with languages; and that it might, therefore, create confusion to extend the applicability of this bill now to language rights.

As a constitutional lawyer, which I think I am entitled to call myself, I would say that the matter of languages is controversial, and because it is controversial there is no simple answer to the question of, for example, the constitutionality of certain proposed legislation now widely discussed. I have my own views. If I may say one more word to Senator Molson, I expect that this will be one matter that will be dealt with in committee at some length.

On motion of Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that when the Senate adjourns this afternoon, it do stand adjourned during pleasure to the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

Perhaps a word of explanation is in order. The purpose of adjourning at this time is to allow committee meetings to proceed this afternoon. Our committees, as honourable senators are aware, are faced with a heavy workload. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will be meeting this afternoon, as will the Transport and Communications Committee and the National Finance Committee.

I am afraid we will have to carry on in this way until we have disposed of the large number of legislative measures currently before the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting this evening, June 8, 1977, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I might say, before the question is put, that it will be an in camera meeting and no reporting staff will be required.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will sit when the Senate rises this afternoon in room 263-S to consider Bill C-41, the Maritime Code.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-47, to amend the Export Development Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

SOLAR ENERGY APPLICATION BILL

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 8:

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 2, the debate on the motion of Senator Austin that Bill C-309, respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and on the motion in amendment thereto of Senator Flynn that the motion be amended by striking out the words "Banking, Trade and Commerce" and substituting therefor the words "Health, Welfare and Science."

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: First of all, I would like to thank the government leader for having given me the opportunity to make my comments at the beginning of the sitting. The Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is meeting at 8:30, and as we shall be discussing an important matter, I would like to be there.

Also, I prefer to speak this evening so that the mover of the bill will not be too nervous about passage of the bill. During the debate, he showed a certain nervousness concerning this bill. I would like to tell him that even though the opposition has serious reservations concerning the bill, as usual we shall try to co-operate with our colleagues opposite to give this bill all the required attention.

Before getting to the main part of my speech, I would like to say that, in my opinion, this bill should never have been introduced in the Senate. As someone said during the debate, this is a public bill. It was identified as a public bill. However, for my part, I still believe that it is a private bill. I shall not come back to the decision of the Speaker. I respect his decision. However, I still believe that this bill is a private bill and that it could have been introduced in another way. It could have been introduced by letters patent so that we could have learned the names of the members of the corporation who would have been interested in establishing this institute to deal with the research concerning domestic and industrial uses of solar energy.

I suggest also that the federal government has institutions that are paid for by the taxpayers. We have a National Research Council in Canada which I am convinced has long since looked into the problem we have before us; I am convinced that this is an urgent problem, that the problem of solar energy is a very urgent one. Furthermore, I am convinced that the National Research Council has now been working on this problem for a long time because in a few years we will be using solar energy on a rather current basis.

So I say this bill should not have been brought before us. My second proposition is that this bill should not even go to committee because we do not know anything at all about it. We will not know more when the bill is referred to committee since the people interested in setting up that institute, or that research committee, did not proceed in the ordinary, customary way which would be, as Senator Deschatelets and other senators indicated, to proceed by way of letters patent of incorporation to set forth the objectives and purposes they were pursuing.

We did not delay the motion to refer the bill to committee, and if I waited until today to speak it was because the sponsor of the bill was absent on Monday. I do not like to talk about someone when he is not in the House. He was absent. Furthermore, I wanted to tell him also that I was very surprised to see the sponsor of the bill, who held very important responsibilities in the past, vote against a motion of adjournment. That was, of course, creating a precedent. That was denying the official opposition the right to be heard. When I saw Senator Austin rise to vote against the adjournment motion, I told myself: Well, he is sincere and wants to gag the opposition, or he does not know the rules. We should, or course, forgive him for that. In any case, as a member of the opposition, I did not accept from the sponsor of the bill that he should vote against the adjournment motion moved by the leader of our party.

With respect to the motion of reference, the sponsor of the bill told us that this bill should be referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. In support, of course, he quoted rule 67 of our rules. That order was very well explained by Senator Grosart when he spoke on that same motion. But, even if rule 67 says that with respect to natural resources and mines this bill should be referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I think that every time we have to refer a bill to committee we should consider the kind of bill we have before us. In what circumstances did it come to us? What are its objectives? Which committee would be best suited to discuss a matter such as solar energy? If I look at the rule I just cited, rule 67, it tells us that "natural resources and mines" can be considered by the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. However, if I look further, I see that the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science must deal with:

—bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to health, welfare and science generally—

If one bill can be said to concern science, it is certainly the one now before us. The sponsor of the bill said so. This bill provides for scientific research concerning solar energy and its domestic and industrial uses. Can the sponsor of the bill say that this legislation will get better attention in the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as he says that this committee deals with natural resources and mines? Of course, solar energy might be considered a natural resource. However, it is stated quite clearly that the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science deals with "science generally".

The second point I would like to make against the bill's being referred to that committee is that, hopefully, as we are aware, the session will come to a conclusion at the end of June, and the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has an extremely heavy schedule of major and significant government legislation. So that committee is currently overloaded and in my view it would have no time left to scrutinize this solar energy legislation.

So as I said, every time we have to refer a bill, we should stop to think that it should not necessarily go to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce because it deals with natural resources and mining. We must first see the nature of the bill involved and its objectives. In this case I feel the committee most suited to scrutinize the bill would be the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science which has direct and special jurisdiction in science matters. It could also be referred to the Special Committee on Science Policy, which is headed by Senator Lamontagne. I think Senator Lamontagne would be very pleased to have this bill before his committee, and give it special attention. Senator Bourget says no, because it is a special committee of the Senate. Just the same, I think Senator Lamontagne would welcome this bill because his staff includes scientists, experts dealing with research, and they would be quite happy to give special attention to the bill now before us.

I conclude because I must attend a committee meeting at 8:30. I therefore submit that the amendment moved by the opposition leader, to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, should be supported.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that we all appreciate the thoughtful remarks of the Honourable Senator Asselin on Bill C-309 in support of the amendment which would have this bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. I must say, however, that the government—

Senator Flynn: The government?

Senator Perrault: The government believes—

Senator Flynn: The government believes?

Senator Perrault: The government believes it is more appropriate that the bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. But, admittedly, as in the case of so many measures which come before the Senate, there are a number of options open. Bills of this kind could conceivably be referred to certain other committees as noted by Senator Asselin. That is indisputably true. However, the government—

Senator Flynn: The government again!

Senator Perrault: The government—

Senator Flynn: May I put a question? I do not see what the government has to do with a bill of private initiative.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I thought it was clear that the rules of the Senate do not permit two senators to stand at the same time. Would you please permit me—

Senator Flynn: Then why don't you sit down?

Senator Perrault: Would you permit me to complete my remarks? I would appreciate that courtesy.

I want to make clear that this is a public bill in the hands of a private member, which was supported by all members of all parties in the other place.

Senator Flynn: Especially by the government.

Senator Perrault: It was supported by the official opposition, by the New Democratic Party and by the government supporters in the other place. The position taken by most of the supporters of the government in this chamber, already expressed in debate, has been that the proposed measure certainly should be referred to a committee of the Senate, as Senator Asselin agreed. Certainly, this is not a government bill. There is no suggestion on the part of anyone on this side, or any supporter of the government in this chamber, that this bill should be immune to any kind of analysis, criticism or even amendment at the committee stage. I want to make that perfectly clear.

As was stated by the sponsor of the bill in this chamber, perhaps this bill may have some defects in it, as do many measures which come before us. However, I would urge that this amendment be defeated and that we get on with the job of referring it to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, so that an analysis of the bill can be undertaken.

Senator Flynn: I am prepared to withdraw my amendment if the Leader of the Government will withdraw his statement that this is the wish of the government. The government has nothing to do with this motion and it does not have anything to do with this bill, as he stated a while ago. I am willing to withdraw my amendment if he will withdraw his assertion, because I do not think that it belongs on the record.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would never think of asking the honourable senator to withdraw anything in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: No, but I thought I could get you to do so.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, perhaps a person who has so far not participated in this interesting debate might be permitted a word or two. I find it difficult to understand why the Leader of the Government feels that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is the only committee fitted to deal with this bill. It is a very able committee, and since I am a member of it I am willing to sing its praises very vigorously, at least at the moment. But, really, if the workload of the various committees is considered, and if what the Leader of the Government says is true, and I agree with him that it is, there are many options open as to which committee it should go to. Why not send it to a perfectly competent committee that does not have the same workload as the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce? I have forgotten how many meetings that committee has scheduled this week, but I do not think it would be much exaggeration to say that it has been meeting morning, noon and night. As far as I can see for the immediate future, it is going to continue to do that. Why not send it to some other competent committee? The Leader of the Government does not deny that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science is a very competent committee which has not such a workload and which could give this bill the attention it deserves, if any.

It seems to me to be a position that is absolutely unsupportable to say that if there are a number of committees, all competent to deal with this bill, you must send it to the one that is the hardest worked. I suppose there always is the understanding among busy people that if you want to get something done give it to someone who is busy. In my view, however, the Health, Welfare and Science Committee is composed of very competent and able people who are willing to work, with a chairman who makes sure they work. So, it seems to me that, taking the argument of the Leader of the Government at its face value—which may not be much—he has no alternative, really, to agreeing that this bill should go to a committee that does not have the workload that Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has.

I suppose that sort of argument from the leader has about as much validity as his argument that two senators should not stand up at once, which is a problem that he could solve by sitting down himself. That, of course, is comment which I suppose will not commend itself to him, but perhaps my next comment will. I have not been here long, but as long as some and long enough to learn a little. One of the things I have learned is that when someone who wishes to speak on something requests of the Senate by means of a motion that the debate be adjourned, the courtesy is extended to him or her immediately, without a moment's hesitation; yet, a few days ago in this debate I saw for the first time a refusal to agree to a motion to adjourn. I am glad to say that the majority of the Senate made sure that that attitude was treated as one which cannot be accepted here, and never will be, by an overwhelming majority on a standing vote. I hope that this situation will not arise again.

I should like to remind the honourable gentleman, who may not have thought of them, of the remedies afforded by our rules to the opposition. If that motion had not carried, the opposition could have continued to maintain various delaying motions so that the Senate could have stayed here all day and all night. The opposition is neither so careless of its rights, nor so reluctant to engage in battle to preserve those rights, as to forget that those opportunities exist. I therefore say to those who would think that such a course of conduct is acceptable here that the opposition is prepared to use to the limit if necessary those rules which are available to it but which it would rather leave unused, preferring to deal with all matters on the basis of common courtesy and common sense.

Let me say again that I support the amendment. I can see absolutely no reason at all to burden the very hard-working chairman and members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with this bill, and I urge honourable senators to vote for the amendment.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, if I understood Senator Asselin correctly, I believe he said that the sponsor of the bill in the Senate was not in the chamber while he was speaking. I should like to assure him that I heard every word he said.

Senator Asselin: No, honourable senator. I said that on Monday night I asked to postpone the debate because you were not here at that time. I waited to speak today so that you would be here.

Senator Austin: I appreciate your waiting to make your remarks until tonight.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, that the Bill C-309, intituled: "An Act respecting the domestic and industrial use of solar energy", be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart, that the motion be amended by striking out the words "Banking, Trade and Commerce", and substituting therefor the words "Health, Welfare and Science".

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in my opinion the nays have it and the motion in amendment is lost.

Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the main motion?

Senator Flynn: On division.

Senator Walker: On division.

Senator Smith (Colchester): It is a reflection of the authority of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION (SCIENTIFIC ACTIVITIES) BILL 1976

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the second reading of Bill C-26, respecting the organization of certain scientific activities of the Government of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-26 is a rather imposing bill. It has 22 pages containing 75 clauses, but it is not a difficult bill to explain because if you examine it closely you will find that it is divided into nine parts, some of them almost identical.

The easiest way to understand Bill C-26 is to remember two points. The first is that it is an omnibus bill or rather a collection of separate bills put together in a single package. Two of them, Parts I and III will be printed as separate acts when the statutes are consolidated.

The second point to remember is that, despite its title, Bill C-26 is related more to the machinery for the implementation of science policy than to science policy per se. It is particularly related to the machinery for the support of scientific research in universities and educational institutions. It amends the acts under which existing machinery operates, modifies their structures and activities and creates two new bodies for dispensing grants.

I am pleased to present Bill C-26, because it reflects the findings of a number of reports and studies which have been submitted to the government in the past few years, with the most important contribution, I think you would agree, coming from the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy under the very able chairmanship of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne. The bill will affect, in addition to the granting councils, the Science Council, the National Research Council laboratories, Canadian Patents and Development Limited, and the Defence Research Board.

Before dealing with its specific provisions, I should like for a moment to outline the philosophy underlying that part of the bill relating to university research support. This, as I stated earlier, is probably the most substantial part of the bill. The government has a strong belief in the importance of a healthy and active university research community, a fact which has been made clear by the Minister of State for Science and Technology in his speeches in Parliament and elsewhere.

The government recognizes, first of all, that research, whether being done in universities, government or industry, is the process by which new knowledge is created and is the foundation of all scientific and technological achievement.

In universities, the conduct of research by professors, research students and research assistants is important to the nation for other reasons as well. It adds to the quality of education given to our university students; it also contributes to the training of scientists and scholars, who carry their knowledge and their approach to inquiry into all aspects of national life. It is through the support of university research that we have created a base in Canada of highly qualified people and a research capability in many disciplines. Canada must have this capability to ensure that we can tap into the world's output of new knowledge, be able to understand the significance of that knowledge, and adapt it to the needs of industry, government, and the furthering of research in the universities.

Canadian universities have accomplished much in research, some of it leading to applications of direct benefit to Canada. Professor Symons has said in his recent report to the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada:

Canada has established a worldwide reputation for leadership in a number of important scientific fields including, for example: fresh water biology research; nuclear physics; physical chemistry; aerial mapping and surveying; the development of geophysical methods and instrumentation; computer science; research into the upper atmosphere; and certain aspects of research in engineering, forestry, agriculture, and the health sciences. University scientists have contributed significantly to the country's achievements and international reputation in such fields.

I would add to that our high level of scholarship and research in certain fields of the social sciences and humanities. As examples, I could point to the publication of the Dictionary of Canadian Biography and important studies on the special problems of the working environment, juvenile delinquency, and the economics of Canadian natural resource policy. There are many others.

The reports I mentioned on university research have come from the OECD and the Science Council, as well as the Senate committee, and they have all questioned whether the mechanisms for federal support of this research adequately serve the interests of the universities and the country as a whole. The alternative institutional mechanisms proposed have ranged from retention of the present system—that is, the three granting councils, namely, the National Research Council, the Canada Council (Social Sciences and Humanities Division) and the Medical Research Council—to a single granting council covering all disciplines. The government's carefully considered view, in pondering these options, is that an evolutionary, rather than revolutionary, change in the structure of the granting councils which builds on their successes is the desirable course. A triumvirate of councils appears to create a balance in the support of the different disciplines which will bring the councils' and the nation's objectives into closer harmony. The proposed changes do, I believe, incorporate the best advice the government has received with the least administrative cost and organizational disruption.

The bill creates, first of all, a Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. This will leave the Canada Council, which at present supports the arts and research and scholarly activity in the social sciences and humanities, to focus its attention on the arts and permit the new council, with a membership of scholars in the social sciences and humanities, to provide support for academic research in these disciplines. This reorganization reflects the growth in size and quality of the social sciences and humanities in this country, and the new perception of their importance to the attack on socio-economic problems, to national sovereignty, and to our cultural development. The Social Sciences Research Council of Canada and the Humanities Research Council of Canada, which are umbrella organizations for the learned societies, have strongly supported the creation of this new council.

Secondly, the bill creates a Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, leaving the National Research Council to give its full attention to the major task of running a large scientific research establishment, industrial research and development support programs, and a national program of scientific and technical information. The creation of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council recognizes the need for a separate agency to support university research in these disciplines, and to foster improved dialogue between natural scientists and engineers in interdisciplinary and priority research areas. Canada must remain in the forefront of appropriate areas of basic research, and must create an environment in which university investigators will have the fullest opportunity to contribute to the solution of problems of a social, economic, and technological nature. The Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council will have the task of developing an imaginative response, in the way of new grants policies and mechanisms, to such expectations.

I would emphasize here that the creation of these two new granting councils will require only a minimal increase in administrative costs since the same personnel and office space will be used as at present.

Thirdly, this legislation alters the Medical Research Council Act to remove the restriction preventing its support of research in the public health field. The amendments will permit, in the future, increased involvement by the Medical Research Council in the support of research and training in the area of health care delivery. Other minor changes to the act will facilitate the administration of the council's business.

In proposing these changes to the granting councils, the government has been very much aware of the environment of continuity and freedom which is required for the fullest exercise of creativity in research. It is fully committed to retaining the "peer review" system, and will not jeopardize the expertise and independence with which the councils support, and scientists and scholars perform, research. The new councils will be departmental crown corporations—that is, Schedule B corporations under the Financial Administration Act—and will be in a position to set their own policies, programs and research objectives.

As a guide to the councils, the government has outlined a number of broad objectives the councils should bear in mind. These have been stated by the science minister previously, but I think they are worth repeating. The councils should (i) encourage excellence in research; (ii) provide a base of advanced knowledge in the universities; (iii) assist in the selective concentration of research activities; (iv) aim for a regional balance in scientific capability; (v) maintain a basic capacity for research training; (vi) encourage curiosity-oriented research; and (vii) encourage research with a potential contribution to national objectives.

These objectives are intended not as a basis for immediate and radical redirection, but to ensure long-term coherence in the federal system of university research granting. The government is attaching particular importance to the encouragement by the councils of research related to national problem areas, interdisciplinary research and the creation of a better regional balance of scientific capability. The membership of the councils will be important from the point of view of defining the councils' objectives, and the government will be aiming for a membership broadly representative of all disciplines being supported and to include, together with the experts, a number of lay people interested in the development of scholarship and scientific research in this country.

Before moving to the other parts of this bill, I should like to say a word about the coordination of council granting policies and council budgets. It is planned that the division of responsibility for university research support among the councils will be along the same general lines as that which has existed among the Medical Research Council and the university granting programs of the National Research Council and the Canada Council. The Minister of State for Science and Technology intends to establish, with the cooperation of the new granting bodies, an Inter-Council Co-ordinating Committee chaired by the secretary of his ministry and including the presidents of the granting councils. Others, from both the public service and the universities, will be asked to participate in the work of the committee from time to time, depending on the matters under discussion. The committee will report to the minister.

As its name implies, the committee will have an advisory and co-ordinating role, rather than a directive role. It will be a forum for discussions among the councils, and between the councils and the government. It will seek to ensure coverage of all recognized disciplines, and that the needs of interdisciplinary research are met. It will harmonize granting practices. It will also make recommendations to the minister on the balance between the budgets of the councils, recognizing, of course, the responsibility of individual ministers for the budget and administration of each council.

I might say here that the Prime Minister has designated the Minister of State for Science and Technology as the responsible minister for the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council; the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the Medical Research Council, which is no change; and the Secretary of State for the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

On council budgets, the government provided an increase of 12 to 13 per cent for 1977-78 to assist the councils in meeting the inflationary rise in university research costs. There has been hardship among university researchers over the last five years. The government, recognizing this, intends to introduce more stability and continuity in the future.

The remainder of the bill consists of amendments to the Science Council Act, the National Research Council Act and the National Defence Act as it affects the Defence Research Board. The Science Council is to have its mandate restated to provide it with a greater national and public role. The council has over the years brought an enlightened point of view to science policy issues relating, for example, to energy, northern development and health care, which has provided valuable guidance to both public and private decision-making across the country. The council will continue to assess the adequacy of Canada's scientific and technological resources to meet new opportunities and will have, as well, a strengthened role as a source of public information on the impact of science and technology. To cope with its broadened responsibilities, and to permit the participation of additional social scientists in the work of the council, the membership of the council is to be expanded from 25 to 30.

I have already spoken of the separation of the granting and laboratory functions of the National Research Council. The amendments to the National Research Council Act are designed to give the council flexibility in its management structure so that it can more readily respond to national problems where science and technology have a part to play in their solution. Provision has also been made to transfer the responsibility for Canadian Patents and Development Limited from the National Research Council to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in order that the exploitation of inventions from government laboratories, and university laboratories which are supported by the federal government, may be linked more closely to the promotion and development of Canadian industry. CPDL will become an even more important vehicle for the transfer of technology from government to industry. Following the publication of the Science Council's report, Technology Transfer: Government Laboratories to Manufacturing Industry, improved ways are being sought, including new uses of CPDL, to transfer technology from the public to the private sector.

The role of the National Research Council will shift somewhat in emphasis as a result of the proposed changes. The council, without its granting function, will have less responsibility for the general development of science in Canada, and more for using the demonstrated capability of its laboratories in tackling national problems. There will continue to be room in the council's mandate for the high quality basic research for which it has deservedly attained an international reputation, both for NRC and Canada.

With regard to defence research, the National Defence Act is to be altered to bring the Defence Research Board into organizational integration with its primary customers, the Canadian Armed Forces. The board will continue as an advisory group to the Minister of National Defence, while the defence research establishments are consolidated within the department. The legislation serves to clarify the new role of the DRB which is already in effect.

Three amendments to the bill were reported to the House of Commons on third reading from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. No objection was raised in the house to these amendments, which do not alter the major proposals of the bill.

● (2050)

Coming to the details of the bill, I think it is more convenient and timesaving to deal with it part by part rather than section by section.

Part I sets up the new council to be known as the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, and describes its functions, organization and operating instructions.

Part II amends the Canada Council Act and describes its new mandate.

Part III is a repetition of Part I, except that the new body it creates is to be known as the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council.

Part IV amends the Science Council of Canada Act and describes its new role.

Part V amends the National Research Council Act and outlines its organization and activities. It also transfers the crown corporation, called Canadian Patents and Development Limited, to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Part VI amends the National Defence Act and integrates the Defence Research Establishments with the Department of National Defence. It also makes the Defence Research Board advisory to the Minister of National Defence.

Part VII amends the Medical Research Board Act and enlarges its scope.

Part VIII is consequential and provides for representation of the new councils on the National Library Board.

Part IX is transitional.

In summary, Bill C-26 reorganizes two of the three federal granting councils for university research and creates two new granting councils. It transfers the granting function and support staff of the NRC to a new council to be called the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council. The NRC will continue to manage its laboratories. It transfers the granting function and support staff of the Canada Council in the area of social sciences and humanities to a new council to be known as the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. The Canada Council will continue to support the arts.

It enlarges the scope of the Medical Research Council to include public health research and it restates the mandate of the Science Council, giving it a national role with respect to public information.

Honourable senators, I believe that Bill C-26 will have significant and beneficial long-term implications for research in Canada, and I strongly recommend it for your approval.

Senator Deschatelets: May I ask the honourable senator a question? This is indeed a very important bill. While I was listening to the details being outlined, I wondered whether some of the provisions contained in the bill were not the result, either directly or indirectly, of some of the recommendations of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy.

Senator Carter: I am pleased to say that such is the case. The honourable senator may not have heard me when I referred to that fact in my introductory remarks.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. David G. Steuart moved the second reading of Bill C-13, to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada, which has been in existence since 1919, advises the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development about those persons, places and events of national historical importance. The board's areas of concern range from recommendations for acquiring properties, buildings and other structures for the purpose of establishing National Historic Parks and Sites to inscriptions for plaques and distinctive monuments all across Canada.

At present the board is composed of 15 members: two representatives each from Ontario and Quebec and one each from the remaining eight provinces, one representative from the National Museums of Canada, the Dominion Archivist, and an officer from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The provincial representatives are usually historians or archivists of great repute. Mr. Marc LaTerreur is the Chairman of the Board. He is also a member of the Department of History of Laval University in Quebec.

The board has established special committees of its members. They include an Executive Committee, a Fur Trade and Indigenous Committee, an Historic Buildings Committee, and an Inscriptions Committee. The committees report to the board at its regular meetings.

In the past 20 years, on the recommendation of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada, more than 70 historic parks and major sites have been designated and almost 700 persons and events of historical significance have been commemorated.

The purpose of amending the Historic Sites and Monuments Act is to have a better representation of two important parts of Canada: the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. Up until now, representatives from these northern regions attended board meetings only as observers and without the right to vote. If the amendment to the act is adopted, the delegates from the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada will no longer voice their opinions in merely an advisory capacity. The board would then have 17 members instead of 15.

The north, with all its human, cultural and natural resources, is becoming increasingly important. In fact, the June meeting of the board will be held in both Vancouver and the Yukon Territory.

The act, as amended in 1968-69, provides that eight members constitute a quorum. It is desirable to keep the figure for the quorum at the same relative level, and therefore the bill will amend the present act to raise the number to nine. Since this bill will broaden representation on the board and recognizes the growing importance of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, I urge all honourable senators to support it.

On motion of Senate Grosart, for Senator Bélisle, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

1. On Wednesday, January 29th, 1975, the Senate approved a motion to appoint a Special Committee to consider and report upon the question of "the installation of stained glass windows in the clerestory of the Senate Chamber". It was reappointed March 10th, 1977. The present members are:

The Honourable Senators:

Austin	Inman
Beaubien	Lafond
Cameron	Lang
Carter	Neiman
Connolly (Ottawa West)	Quart
Deschatelets	Sullivan
Forsey	Thompson
Hicks	Zuzyk

2. The Committee held eight meetings for the purpose of receiving evidence, and an additional meeting to consider its Report.

I JURISDICTION AND AUTHORITY

3. The Clerk of the Senate and Clerk of the Parliaments, Mr. Robert Fortier, Q.C., was called as a witness to advise your Committee of its power and of the power of the Senate to deal with the matter of the installation of stained glass in the clerestory of the Senate Chamber. It was clear from this evidence, and we so report, in the light of custom and precedents, that the Senate is master of its own precincts, both in respect of major changes and installations (which this is) as well as housekeeping items. The Senate has no budget for this work. Arrangements for such work are normally made by the Department of Public Works. The estimates of that department carry any item required to defray such cost. In this respect the authority of the Senate as regards the precincts of the Chamber is analogous to that of the House of Commons in respect to that Chamber. The Senate may initiate a project. The Department of Public Works is the executive authority.

4. This testimony was confirmed by Mr. Guy Desbarats, Assistant Deputy Minister, Design and Construction, of the Department of Public Works. (1:17) (24-3-77)

II THE LOCUS OF PARLIAMENT

5. We think it important to report upon some evidence we received touching the architecture on Parliament Hill in Ottawa. The original buildings were designed by Thomas Fuller and his associates about 1859. The style was Victorian Gothic. Henry Russell Hitchcock, a great American art historian, wrote of that original grouping:

"The variety of forms, the gusto of the detail, and the urbanistic scale of this project made of the Dominion capital a major monumental group unrivalled, for extent and complexity of organization, in England."

6. The existing centre block was designed by John Pearson after the fire of 1916. Dr. R. H. Hubbard, Chief Curator of the National Gallery, describes the style as "modern Gothic." And of the area he said "it is one of the great architectural groupings in the world." (7:8)

7. Miss Jean Boggs, Director of the National Gallery, spoke of the need to harmonize every structural or decorative change with the established style in "this admirable work of architecture." (7:5)

8. Of changes in the Senate Chamber, Miss Boggs stressed the importance of understanding what is appropriate, given the architectural setting, when a project is being planned.

9. The Committee would emphasize the importance of this advice.

III STYLE, COMPOSITION AND TREATMENT—FOR THE DECOR OF THE SENATE CHAMBER

10. If the windows in the clerestory of the Senate are to be treated with stained glass the questions of style, composition and treatment are of great importance. Style is a factor of harmonizing what is done in the clerestory with the other physical features of the chamber. Composition is subject matter. Is there a theme to be developed? How, too, does this theme relate to other elements of the structure and decor of the room? As for treatment, one must determine how specifically the components of the chosen theme are to be distributed and represented.

11. The Senate is an integral part of Parliament. It is the only place where Parliament's three elements meet. Parliament is central to the democratic process. It is the focus of attention for most Canadian studies in political science. It is visited annually by tens of thousands of Canadians and by many foreign visitors. It is reported upon constantly in the media. Politics and politicians are the warp and woof of conversation of our people. The place where this interest is generated has become, in a sense, a shrine. If it is a place of dignity and even of majesty, it will raise the perspectives and broaden the horizons and opportunities of those who make it function. If its buildings and their components and surroundings can indicate something of the purposes, the aspirations and the achievements of the nation, the place of Parliament can be of enormous inspirational value to our people.

12. For these reasons the Committee was concerned that any theme chosen for the windows should support these objectives. It is impressed with the importance of reflecting the broad lines of national progress and national life, as the work of parliamentarians should reflect that progress and that life.

13. It early became clear that despite the Committee's restricted terms of reference it could not recommend a theme for the windows without considering other features of the chamber. In particular it was repeated many times by both artistic experts and historians, that the eight pictures now lodged on the walls of the Senate, despite their history, their artistic qualities and their emotional appeal, might not be retained indefinitely. Through them, for over half a century, the Senate had honoured the sacrifices the country, its armed forces, and its people made in the first world war. The ideals which inspired those sacrifices are a permanent part of our history, and their purpose, to preserve the Canadian way of life, has been achieved. The nation and its people since have advanced tremendously in freedom and in opportunity. Now the larger milestones of that progress may be worthy of commemoration in a chamber of Parliament.

14. If then, in time, these pictures are to be displaced, any theme adopted for the stained glass must not preclude the choice of an appropriate theme for the decor of the walls. Moreover, there should not be conflict between the subject matter and treatment of the windows and that of the walls.

IV THE WINDOWS: COMPOSITION OR THEME

15. To assist the committee with suggestions for a solution of these problems, we had evidence from Dr. Jacques Monet of the University of Ottawa, and President of the Canadian Historical Association, and Dr. J. M. S. Careless, of the University of Toronto, the Association's immediate past president. One could not summarize adequately the excellent evidence given us by these two fine scholars. They were learned, enthusiastic at the opportunity presented by the project, and keen about the messages and the inspiration which could flow, for Canadians, from the right decisions.

16. An assessment of this evidence leads the Committee to conclude that the theme for the windows should be the ethnic origins of the Canadian people. It is felt that this is not in conflict with the symbols in the beautiful ceiling which represent the founding racial groups of modern Canada. There would be some overlap. But it would not detract from the main concept. Discoverers and explorers investigated the immense terrain. It was those who were here earlier and those who came later, who forged the new nationality, in unity, on the northern half of the continent and made of it a dynamic progressive and favoured habitat for a peaceful people to live in opportunity and optimism.

17. Problems of style and treatment, of the division and allocation of space in the windows are thought to be a function of another group or committee of senators which would work with the artists and their advisers. Certainly advice from historians would be needed at this later stage of development. As the project develops it is hoped that interested groups in many Canadian communities could supply ideas. No one can say that the present ethnic composition of Canada's population is now set for all time. But it is within our grasp to make adequate use of the materials we have available at this stage of Canadian development.

18. In his evidence to the Committee Mr. John F. MacNeill, formerly Clerk of the Senate and of the Parliaments, made the point most emphatically that the idea and fact of unity, basic to national feeling anywhere, is especially important in Canada. There was no suggestion of developing a sense of introspective isolationism. Rather it was urged that unity could continue to foster a nobility of national purpose. There should therefore be a harmony in the accoutrements of the Senate chamber which would embellish this idea. But it is the people of the nation in their diversity and variety who must achieve it.

V WALLS: COMPOSITION OR THEME

19. Four proposals are submitted for the treatment of the walls, following receipt of evidence given by many witnesses.

(a) Parliamentary Development

20. If the windows are to acknowledge the ethnic contribution to Canadian society, some evidence proposed the adoption of a theme for the walls to show the development of government in Canada. Witnesses traced the possibilities of this proposal from the meetings of the early Indian tribes, through the Sovereign Council of New France, and the early legislatures in the Central and Atlantic regions as well as of the regions of the west and north, to the more developed assemblies of the modern era and the period of our juridical self-sufficiency. Most of the significant events of Canada's history have not been wars or revolutions or famines or plagues. They have been—regardless how primitive in some cases—parliamentary events. They reflect constitutional progression—reasonable and orderly—in tune with the growth and complexity of a changing society.

21. The Committee concludes that this theme, worked out on the walls, would not conflict with the ethnic theme of the windows. One in fact would supplement the other. It may be for another generation of senators to complete the project for the walls. It is hoped, however, that the views of the present committee might help to avoid any discordant elements between the two projects, should such theme prove practical.

22. It was suggested for consideration, to depict meetings of the primitive community meetings starting with assemblies of Indian Chiefs and leading up to our developed forms of legislative chambers. Such arrangement would supply historical sequence, but the depictions are bound to be repetitive. Only the more recent would have an influence on existing parliamentary establishments. To-day few Canadians and few parliamentarians look to performance in earlier forms of legislative assemblies for guidance or for inspiration. The development of legislative institutions in Canada followed the progress of the people of scattered primitive frontier settlements to a more populous, urban industrial society. The process was one of evolution of accepted popular forms to meet the needs of the times and the capacity of the people to operate newer institutions. This is not to say that agitation did not precede reforms. It did. But it seems reasonable to say that the agitation was not shattering as was the case in the French Revolution, or in the U.S. War of Independence. Nor did a wholly new permanent constitution emerge at one time.

(b) The Primacy of the Law

23. A second option for the walls is more broadly based. The purpose of a legislative chamber is to enact law. In the Judeo-Christian dispensation—the civilization of the West—law is based upon its ethic, its concept of morality. This is derived from its religious (though not sectarian) beliefs. The fundamental precepts as well as their positive developments can be associated with historic characters—law givers—all readily recognized. Their significance can be portrayed easily. Legislation in the countries of the West should conform to the basic elements of these fundamental pronouncements. This is not to say that a legislator adverts to the Decalogue or to the Magna Carta each time he debates a new proposal. But with his experience he recognizes a proposal which conforms to or departs from the fundamental human rights which they enshrine. It is not enough to have in other countries monuments to such events and people. If we as a people follow in the tradition, we should have reminders here—and for our own inspiration. And we must join to this, significant milestones of our own constitutional development. As we build, it is prudent to stand upon the shoulders of the greats among the ancients. Wherefore, from the following, an appropriate selection might be made.

24. The underlying ethos of the people of Canada is rooted in the institutions of the Western world. It seems appropriate to proclaim in our senior legislative halls some of those fundamental propositions upon which our systems of law are founded, the figures of some of the law givers who announced them or the events or occasions from which they emerge. Some are ancient, some are contemporary. It would be important to make a careful selection from the long list available. Nor should we be reticent about our allegiance to these pervading traditions. There is in them a sublimity of thought which both ennobles and inspires the human spirit. Here are some examples of what might be considered.

25. The ethic of the West springs from the propositions of the Decalogue. The heroic human, the instrument of the new dispensation, was Moses. He was indeed a law giver and as such inspired the genius of Michelangelo. We too can make a gambade of reverence in his direction.

26. We should consider Solon, the Athenian statesman, the positive law giver of the 6th century B.C. He distinguished between international and domestic law. He reformed the constitutional and economic laws of Greece and he led his countrymen in primitive but significant steps towards the democratic control of state power.

27. The Christian dispensation has shaped the mores of the West. Wherefore to show Christ disputing with the doctors and teaching the people in the temple of Herod as he instituted the new dispensation would be essential to this theme.

28. Justinian too is a figure of heroic proportions. He was a codifier of the pronouncements of the jurisconsults of Greece and Rome and from whose work many of the legal precepts and systems both of civil and common law are derived.

29. When the barons of England met John at Runnymede in 1215, the Charter which emerged from the confrontation between the aristocracy and the autocrat contained the seeds of processes from which have grown many of our democratic institutions.

30. Voltaire wrote of Louis IX—Louis of Poissy—that he was

“a prince destined to reform Europe, had it been capable of being reformed, to render France triumphant and civilized, and to be a model for the rest of mankind.”

Louis IX belongs with the law givers of history, and with those who dispensed justice.

31. Coming closer to home, we could acknowledge how western men have recognized basic human rights—the great freedoms—the principles, v.g., of anti-slavery and anti-apartheid. Most of these are embodied in the Atlantic Charter. But, how does one create such a tableau? Does one go abroad to men like Wilberforce or O'Connell or Lincoln or Churchill or Roosevelt? One should include significant contributions made by Canadians to those principles. Or does one select a signal event symbolic of the march towards a climate of personal fulfillment for the free human spirit. There is a challenge in this proposal both for the person who designs the artistic conception and for the person who executes it.

32. It would be important to consider contemporary and significant events in Canada's history. For example, the giving of the Royal Assent to the British North America Act of 1867. This may have been done by Victoria in her Council or it may have been done by the Commissioners in the House of Lords.

33. It would seem too that a reference should be made to the Statute of Westminster. From it not only did Canada derive her virtual independence which Canadians have asserted in war and in peace, but as well it gave Canada an important status in a Commonwealth which may yet have a significant role in world affairs.

34. Finally too, our close association with the founding and development of the United Nations would be an acknowledgement of the determination of Canadians to play, as we have played, a modest but effective role in the peaceful life of the international community. This is not suggested as a record of achievement. Rather it would express a hope for useful membership in groups which shape the great aspirations of human kind. As a people, we are not the directors and shapers of major world events. However, we can give moral and sometimes tangible support to the great and noble thrusts of an unfolding history.

(c) Legends of the Canadian People

35. It had been suggested as a third option that the theme for the eight spaces on the walls might be the legends of our people. Some research has been done and the proposals are available from the Committee Clerk. While the Committee concludes that the suggestions are imaginative and might well result in tableaux of beauty, in modern Canada legends are not meaningful to the majority of people. In future years they could be, but legends require time to become established in Canadian thought—in its diversity—and enough time may not have yet elapsed.

(d) Stone—with Architectural Features

36. A fourth option arises from evidence supplied by officials of the Department of Public Works, some of whom were architects. Since this proposal does not involve a theme, it is more appropriately discussed later under the heading "Style or Treatments of the Walls."

VI STYLE OR TREATMENT OF THE WINDOWS

37. As already noted, the style of the windows should conform to what Dr. Hubbard (7:6) described as the modern Gothic style of the Senate chamber and of the building generally. This is a problem for the artist to resolve. The composition or theme for each window should illustrate the ethnic motif, suggested above. But on the question of treatment, the Committee faced a problem. It arose from the position of the windows, which are clerestory windows, high in the walls above persons viewing the area of the floor. The tops of the 48 lights in the main part of the chamber are 45' above floor level. Moreover, each light, apart from the tracery above it, is 7½' high and 21" wide. (7:5) These lights are in 8 symmetrical groups of 6 main lights each. It is clear that in windows relatively small and highly placed, figures and other detail would not be particularly significant.

38. Again the light from the west is very strong on sunny afternoons. Considerable protection is therefore needed for the east side of the chamber.

39. Miss Boggs referred to the impossibility of absorbing elaborate historical compositions into the windows. She insisted, however, upon a simplification of design—probably some symbolism—to achieve the ethnic motif. Miss Yvonne Williams, R.C.A., spoke about the aesthetic power of good glass in the hands of a skilled artist (5:10). Viewers will enter into a theme with great imagination, even when there is but an oblique allusion to an idea. (5:8) We think that the advice of these acknowledged experts should be followed; that the composition of the windows should be uncluttered with figures. It should emphasize colour to convey a sense of inspiration (7:7), and set off the ceiling as a crown. (5:6)

VII STYLE OR TREATMENT OF THE WALLS

40. We repeat. Our terms of reference are restricted to problems surrounding the installation of stained glass in the windows of the Senate chamber. Witnesses have stressed the importance to the dignity of Parliament of a harmony in the precincts of the building and of its chambers. As for the existing pictures on the walls and their theme of events in the war of 1914-15, some witnesses urged us to consider the use of a broader theme for the Chamber. The Committee believes that in this broader theme is much that is appropriate. Miss Boggs recommended that the windows and the possible replacement of the paintings should be considered together (7:5) and developed together (7:14). The windows should express more 'abstract concepts', while the walls would be developed for 'a more literal and educative function' (7:14). The purpose? To quote her: "I hope it is possible to give a very fresh and noble interpretation of Canada's history in that room." (7:8)

41. What vehicle should be used on the walls? Removable paintings? Permanent murals? Tapestries of Canadian production? The use of tapestries suggested by Mr. Jean Marie Ostiguy, of the National Gallery, was endorsed by Miss Boggs and Dr. Hubbard. It is an appropriate and imaginative suggestion. The Committee would recommend interested persons to consult a volume "Great Tapestries" available in the Library of Parliament and published in Lausanne, Switzerland in 1965, edita—S.A.

42. Architects and officials of the Department of Public Works appeared before the Committee on March 24th, 1977. They proceeded upon the assumption that the existing pictures on the walls of the Senate chamber would be removed. For many and technical reasons they rejected the use of other pictures or tapestries for the walls. They urged favourable consideration for painting upon the walls the design of Mr. John Pearson, the original architect of the chamber. This design shown in Appendices B and C (24-3-1977) was for galleries on the east and west sides of the chamber. This mural would be a "trompe l'œil" (1:6) (24-3-77)—a mural painting of architecture. Such work might cost over $250,000 and might be completed within a few years (1:10) (24-3-77). Examples of such treatment in European buildings were shown the Committee (1:9). They pointed out that such murals would not present the complications which tapestries or murals would produce (1:11). It was said that tapestries or paintings would conflict with the windows. They would also offend the gothic features of the chamber by continuing the element of "horizontal-ity," which the existing pictures create. Architects urged the Committee to keep as close as possible to the original neo-gothic architectural aspects of the room (1:13). They said that tapestries might cost several millions of dollars (1:14).

43. The Committee does not think that the proposal of the architects for an architectural mural—a trompe l'œil—would be acceptable. It can understand the concerns of the architects.

44. The original plans of the Senate chamber provided for galleries in the spaces where the pictures are now installed. It seems unlikely that this modification will be made, and for various reasons, including the use of television. But there may be a permanent unobtrusive installation provided to accommodate television cameras (1:29) (24-3-77) instead of the unsightly and dangerous platforms now used at the Opening of Parliament.

45. While the Committee is not in favour of painting an architectural design upon the walls, it is suggested that the design of Mr. John Pearson might be adapted to another arrangement. This would be the installation of either stone or wood along the lines of the Pearson sketches. If wood, it would appear as the continuation of the existing panelling. This treatment, however, would darken the chamber and give it a heavy look.

46. The Committee considers that if paintings or tapestries are not appropriate, serious consideration should be given to a solution in which stone alone be used. This means that the space below the windows and above the wood panelling would be decorative stone to match the other stone of the chamber. It is suggested that the design be based upon the sketches of Mr. John Pearson. However, instead of openings for galleries between the arches as in the Pearson design, there would be a stone facing. In the result the chamber would be brighter, and the architectural features in the stone would eliminate monotony.

47. Behind the arches, instead of galleries, there could be a flat stone facing. Better still, monolithic blocks could be carved in high relief in the style used in the lobby of the House of Commons just above the main pillars. A theme for these carvings could be selected from the themes outlined above in this report. The blocks could in fact be carved elsewhere than in the Chamber and thereafter installed.

48. The Committee is inclined to the conclusion as stated in paragraph 16 above, that the theme for the windows should be the ethnic origins of the Canadian people. The design should be simple with some symbolism to achieve the ethnic motif and should emphasize colour to convey the sense of inspiration as suggested in paragraph 39 hereof.

49. The Committee also favours a treatment for the walls as summarized in paragraph 47 above. In this connection the Committee would allude to Thomas Hardy—"The Abbey Mason"—on the restoration of the Abbey of Westminster:—

"The new-vamped Abbey shaped apace
In the fourteenth century of grace;
(The church which, at an after date, Acquired cathedral rank and state.)
Panel and circumscribing wall
Of latest feature, trim and tall,
Rose roundabout the Norman core,
In prouder pose than theretofore."

VIII SELECTION OF ARTIST FOR STAINED GLASS

50. Mr. Gerald Tooke, of the Department of Visual Arts at Algonquin College, Ottawa, said that the proposed installation of the windows in the Senate chamber is the most serious project in stained glass in Canada (apart from the House of Commons) for the last ten or fifteen years.

51. The Committee desires to report that all witnesses were familiar with the recent installation of stained glass in the windows of the House of Commons. All approved with enthusiasm, the style, the composition and the treatment of the project for that chamber. It was designed and executed by Miss Eleanor Milne, of the Department of Public Works. She supervises the carving and the decor in the centre block of the Parliament Buildings. We are indebted to Miss Milne for her continuous help to the Committee.

52. The Committee had many letters and a petition from persons interested in the project for the windows. The request made in these communications was that the artist or artists for the design and execution of the project should be selected after a competition, open across Canada (and inferentially, at least, that the proposal with the lowest tender price should be awarded the contract.)

53. Both Miss Boggs and Mr. Tooke, for various reasons, advised against an open competition. For one thing it would be too costly in time and money for the unsuccessful aspirants. Miss Williams recommended that a genius be sought—and that if a single theme is selected, one artist should direct the work on the windows. The officials of the Department of Public Works would have to consider the wisdom of holding a competition (1:19) (24-3-'77).

54. Should stained glass windows be installed some modification of the lighting system will be required. (Miss Williams and Miss Milne discussed this.) Structural changes are not expected to be needed.

55. It is clear from the evidence that the Senate or a committee thereof would not award a contract. That is a function of the Department of Public Works. Miss Boggs indicated, however, that the Department would undoubtedly seek the assistance of an interdepartmental group of persons expert in the field. She added that because of the authority of the Senate touching matters of major importance in its precincts, a committee of the Senate must be consulted when the interdepartmental committee proposes to make recommendations in respect of style, composition and treatment generally of the windows and of the selection of the artist.

IX SELECTION OF ARTIST FOR A PROJECT FOR THE WALLS

56. The Committee does not urge that the two projects proceed simultaneously, although the plans for both should be harmonized before any work proceeds. Indeed financial considerations may delay both projects at this time. The interdepartmental committee above mentioned, must also be fully conversant with the problems of decoration of the walls. On this issue it must consult with a committee of the Senate. It will find many proposals in the evidence supplied by historians to the Committee. It may require additional consultation with the historians and others.

57. If the walls are to be completed in stone, the design of John Pearson is virtually a ready-made plan. If pictures, or murals, or tapestries are to be used, the project will present more problems. In this event the interdepartmental committee should recommend the method of selection of the artist and the elements of the project must be approved by a committee of the Senate.

58. If it transpires that a single artist should direct the work on the windows and a separate artist should supervise the work for the walls, their work should be co-ordinated for style, composition and treatment. In fact co-operation must be a condition of their appointment even if both be subject to higher management.

59. The report of the interdepartmental committee should be made jointly to the Minister of Public Works and to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

X THE AREA OF THE THRONE

60. Although the area of the Throne in the Senate chamber was not part of the Committee's terms of reference, advantage was taken of the presence of the officials from the Department of Public Works to obtain their views. They produced a sketch by Mr. John Pearson. A copy appears as an Appendix to this report. It shows the Throne itself with a canopy which is kept low enough to reveal the sculptures. (1:22) The officials will supply further detail and an estimate of cost in due time (1:23). The canopy, in wood and appropriately carved, would in effect be a reredos, a screen in front of which the two main chairs of the throne would be placed.

61. The Committee observes that while some of the carving in stone is shown on the sketch, the four heads, two near the base of each pillar, are obscured. It might be possible to design the canopy, to display these four decorative features.

XI RECOMMENDATIONS

62. The following are the concluding views of the Committee:—

1. At an appropriate time the coloured windows in the clerestory of the Senate Chamber should be replaced with stained glass.
2. The theme should be the ethnic origins of the Canadian people.
3. The style should conform with the other features of the Chamber and of the building.
4. The treatment of the windows should be simple and uncluttered. Suitable colour should be a feature. Red should be a predominant colour. Protection against direct sunlight must be ensured.
5. A decision should be made respecting the installation of permanent facilities for television in the Chamber.

6. The Senate, at a suitable time, should consider the removal of the pictures now on the walls of the chamber to an appropriate place of display in Ottawa.

7. The style, composition and treatment of a project for the replacement of these pictures should be in harmony with the stained glass and the general features of the Senate Chamber.

8. The treatment of the windows and the walls should be considered by an interdepartmental committee working with a committee of the Senate. This work should begin at an early date.

9. There should be adequate liaison between the Minister of Public Works and the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, and the report of the interdepartmental committee should be made jointly to both Ministers. The Leader of the Government in the Senate, or his nominee, should report thereon from time to time to the Senate.

10. Consideration should be given to the wisdom of proceeding simultaneously with the projects for both windows and walls.

11. The timing of the project(s) should abide a review of the estimate of cost and the availability of the required funds.

63. The Committee desires to record its appreciation of the help it had from artists, scholars, and the officials who assisted the Committee, and to Mr. John Parkin, the President of the Royal Canadian Academy for his advice.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN J. CONNOLLY,
Chairman.

RULES OF THE SENATE

REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON STANDING RULES AND ORDERS PRESENTED

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a report from the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders recommending certain changes in the Rules of the Senate.

The Clerk Assistant (Reading):

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, having examined the Rules of the Senate pursuant to rule 67(1)(e), recommends that the said rules be amended as follows—

Senator Flynn: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Tuesday next.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I wonder if it can be taken for granted that the report will be printed as part of the Debates of today. It would certainly be important for senators to have a look at it.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, my understanding is that it would normally be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, but if it is the wish of the Senate to have it appear in the Debates of the Senate, that is fine.

I might say, en passant, that since these changes are being recommended at this late stage in the session, it might be advisable to have them become effective only at the beginning of the next session.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The report follows:)

Thursday, June 9, 1977

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, having examined the Rules of the Senate pursuant to Rule 67(1)(e), recommends that the said Rules be amended as follows:

1. Page 2, Rule 5(e):

Strike out the definition "inquiry" and substitute therefor the following:

"(e) "inquiry" means the procedure whereby a senator, after giving notice in accordance with Rules 43 and 44, calls the attention of the Senate to a particular matter for the purpose of informing the Senate of that matter or having it considered or examined by the Senate;"

2. Page 3, Rule 5(n):

Strike out the definition "question" and substitute therefor the following:

"(n) "question", except in respect of the question period and a question of privilege, means a proposal presented to the Senate or a committee thereof by the Speaker or chairman for consideration and disposal in some manner;"

3. Page 6, Rule 20:

Strike out Rule 20 and substitute therefor the following:

"20. (1) When the Speaker calls the question period, a senator may, without notice, address an oral question to

(a) the Government Leader in the Senate, if it is a question relating to public affairs,

(b) a senator who is a minister of the Crown, if it is a question relating to his ministerial responsibility, or

(c) the chairman of a committee, if it is a question relating to the activities of that committee.

(2) Supplementary questions may be asked.

(3) If an oral question cannot be answered immediately, the senator to whom it is addressed may take the question as notice.

(4) A debate is out of order on an oral question, but brief explanatory remarks may be made by the senator who asks the question and by the senator who answers it.

20A. (1) A question described in paragraph 20(1)(a) or (b)

(a) that seeks statistical or other information not readily available, or

(b) to which an answer in writing is desired, shall be sent in writing to the Clerk of the Senate to be placed on the order paper until answered.

(2) The reply to a question on the order paper shall be printed in the Debates of the Senate of the day on which it is given.

20B. A preamble to a question, whether it is asked orally or in writing, is out of order."

4. Page 7, Rule 28:

Strike out Rule 28 and substitute therefor the following:

"28. A senator shall not speak more than once to any question or other matter before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of his speech in which he may have been misunderstood, and then he shall not introduce new matter."

5. Page 10, Rule 42:

Strike out Rule 42 and substitute therefor the following:

"42. (1) The Speaker shall stand head uncovered when addressing the Senate.

(2) The Speaker may participate in any debate other than a debate on a point of order, or a question of privilege, on which the Speaker is required to render a decision.

(3) If the Speaker participates in a debate in accordance with subsection (2), the Speaker shall leave the chair and may call upon any senator to preside as Speaker until the Speaker resumes the chair."

6. Page 20, Rule 75:

Strike out Rule 75 and substitute therefor the following:

"75. (1) A senator who has any pecuniary interest whatsoever, not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown, in the matter referred to any select committee, shall not sit on such committee and any question arising in the committee relating to that pecuniary interest may be determined by the committee, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

(2) Subject to subsection (1), a senator on whose motion any bill, petition or other matter is referred to a special committee may, if he so desires, be a member of the committee."

Respectfully submitted,

H. de M. Molson,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, June 15, 1977, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, June 13, 1977, at eight o'clock in the evening.

• (1410)

Before the question is put I should like to outline for you briefly, as well as I can at this time, the work schedule for the Senate and its committees next week. We are planning to have the Senate sit in the evening on Tuesday as well as Monday so that all day Tuesday may be devoted to committees.

As honourable senators know, we already have a substantial amount of legislation on the order paper to continue with next week, and we can expect the following bills from the House of Commons: Bill C-3, to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation; Bill C-23, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement; Bill C-46, to amend the Aeronautics Act and the National Transportation Act; and Bill C-6, respecting Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities in Canada, and, of course, there may be others.

I shall now mention the committee meetings that have already been set down. There will be additions to this schedule as further bills are referred. On Tuesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m., in camera, on the subject matter of Bill C-16; the National Finance Committee will meet in camera at 2.30 p.m. on the estimates of the Department of Public Works, and the Health, Welfare and Science Committee will meet at 3.30 p.m. to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare with respect to the proposed ban on saccharin.

On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has called a meeting for 9.30 a.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-42, the Combines Investigation Act.

On Thursday the National Finance Committee will hold another meeting in camera on Public Works estimates; the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is meeting at 11 a.m., and there will be a meeting of the Agriculture Committee on the beef industry at 3.30 p.m. or when the Senate rises.

In the light of the foregoing, it is quite possible that it will be necessary for the Senate to sit on Friday next week.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say, to add to the remarks by the honourable deputy leader, that there is a possibility, as of today, of twelve additional bills, not on the list read by the deputy leader, which will be before us by the end of the month. I know that all senators would wish to co-operate as fully as possible in order to expedite the legislative program. In view of the additional demands on time which are going to be made I hope to be able to discuss with the Leader of the Opposition some of the scheduling of this proposed legislation so that we can meet the time schedule and will not find ourselves sitting until the end of August.

Senator Flynn: I suggest that the deadline the other place seems to have set may not be the same as we will want for this place. Especially will this be the case if bills come to us the day before the other place has set as its intended day of departure.

Senator Perrault: Of course not. However, I know that in the other chamber there have been some delays that had not been anticipated. Perhaps we should put it that way. It is therefore not an arbitrary deadline by those in the other chamber.

Senator Flynn: Oh, no.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) moved third reading of Bill C-47, to amend the Export Development Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Steuart for the second reading of Bill C-13, to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, the purpose of amending the Historic Sites and Monuments Act is to ensure better representation of two important regions of Canada, namely, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

I believe that the members of this house will approve a measure which proposes to increase the number of members on the Historic Sites and Monuments Board from 15 to 17 by permitting the addition of one representative for each of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory in order to give them full voting rights. Honourable senators will agree that this amendment should have been proposed a number of years ago, because until now representatives from these regions attended board meetings only as observers without the right to vote.

To emphasize the necessity of having representatives from the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories fully participating in the work of the board, I wish to say a few words about the role fulfilled by the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada.

Before a site is referred to the board for consideration, a background paper is prepared by the National Historic Parks and Sites Branch research staff. The board then determines the significance of the site and makes its recommendation to the minister. The board gives informed and impartial advice to the minister and fulfils the role of an independent jury in determining whether a site is of national historic significance.

In order that the board member may effectively carry out his duties, he must at all times be in effective communication with the department in Ottawa and its regional office as appropriate. To this end he should expect to be consulted on all matters concerning the locations of national historic parks, sites and monuments to be established or erected in his province and to be informed of the progress of all departmental operations that affect his province.

In the past 20 years, on the recommendation of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada, more than 70 historic parks and major sites have been designated, and almost 700 persons and events of historical significance have been commemorated.

[Translation]

The mere mention of some of the achievements of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board enables us to go over our history. Allow me to mention, among others, Fort Louisbourg in Nova Scotia, a monument to the glory of New France; the Saint-Maurice Ironworks in Quebec, site of the first steel industry in Canada, founded in 1729; and small Fort Garry in Manitoba, built of stone by the Hudson's Bay Company around 1830, which has been restored with its big house and attic full of furs.

[English]

We have in Ontario a magnificent site marking the relationship between Canada and the United States when it was not quite as happy as it is today. There are stories in my part of Ontario, and I am sure that each member of the house could find stories, as the Parliamentary Secretary has said, as interesting as any. If young Canadians want to look to an exciting past, let them look to the past of this nation. If there is to be an understanding between the various regions of Canada and the various cultural groups in Canada, I think this kind of preservation and memorializing is more significant than we are sometimes prepared to admit. We have a lot of difficulties in Canada now. We have misunderstanding—perhaps lack of understanding—from place to place, and I think we can begin the job of erasing these differences by understanding and having a feeling for the roots from which we all have sprung and the events in our nation's development which have affected every one of us. If that is the object of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board—and I am sure that is part of it—it should be supported by all Canadians.

● (1420)

Bill C-13 is a straightforward bill which should become law as soon as possible. I should like to emphasize the necessity for the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada to provide adequate information on its work to the public. So many groups are willing to work for the conservation of our heritage but too often, unfortunately, they don't know where to apply for information and professional advice. Therefore, the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada should play a more active role in ensuring the participation of interested groups in the important task of preserving our national heritage.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, unless any other senator wishes to speak in this debate, I move second reading on behalf of Senator Steuart. Before the question is put, could I inform Senator Bélisle that if it is his wish to refer the bill to committee that will be done. If not, third reading may be moved.

Senator Bélisle: If it pleases honourable senators, the bill could be given third reading now.

Senator Flynn: Next sitting.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Petten, for Senator Steuart, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1977

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-53, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970 and other acts subsequent to 1970.

He said: Honourable senators, a public announcement was made in the House of Commons in June, 1975, by the then Minister of Justice, of the commencement by the Department of Justice of work towards the development of a new program of statute law amendment. The program was designed to provide for the correction of anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, and errors discovered from time to time in federal statutes. At present, unless major changes are made in a particular statute, the correction of troublesome errors must await the next ten-year consolidation; and as a result, in some instances, administration is rendered more difficult, and, indeed, hardships occur in the interval.

The program is regarded as a unique step forward in the area of law reform, and has been highly commended by numerous members of the judiciary and others as a most useful innovation. It will be seen that the usefulness of the program arises in large part from the regular periodic nature of successive bills, of which the present bill is the first to be introduced.

It has been stressed by the Minister of Justice, and the point has been acknowledged by other parties in the other house, that non-controversiality is of the essence of the program and of the individual proposed amendments contained in the bill. In fact, it has been made clear to the Department of Justice officials, and to committees that have had an opportunity to examine the bill, that should any proposed amendment be objected to, it should be deleted from the bill, not only to avoid the possibility of controversy but for the purpose of preserving throughout this program the atmosphere of mutual benefit and participation that was truly intended with its inauguration.

The bill contains about 160 amendments, 33 of which are included in schedules of corrections to either the English or the French version of the statutes. Eighty statutes are affected, and the amendments now in the bill are those regarded throughout as completely non-controversial.

The bill contains one amendment which involves a slight additional annual expenditure, namely, the National Library Act, where an addition to the personnel of the National Library Board may entail as much as $1,000 of additional expenditures in a year. Other than in this instance, none of the amendments would involve additional expenditures of public funds.

There are no amendments to the Criminal Code. These are dealt with under a separate series of statutory amendments.

The bill was tabled in the other place, and referred to and reported on by the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of the Commons in draft form which committee recommended the following changes.

One of the original amendments proposed that the location of the head office of the Canadian Commercial Corporation be relocated from the city of Ottawa into the National Capital Region. It was originally proposed as clause 5 but was deleted as being possibly of a controversial nature.

An amendment has been included, as clause 18, changing the period in respect of which contributions would be made to provinces under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act from the calendar year to the fiscal year ending March 31. This change was deleted at the request of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and is to be included in another bill containing more comprehensive amendments to that act.

The bill had originally contained a clause, No 23, repeating section 4 of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act. This section of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act had set out the wages and hours of workmen employed by the Government of Canada, and it had been thought to be redundant in view of the new legislation respecting collective bargaining. It was determined, however, that the section still had some applicability, and its deletion was omitted with the concurrence of the Department of Labour.

With the exception of certain editorial corrections the only other two changes in the original bill as tabled were additions now appearing as clauses 27 and 44 of the present bill.

● (1430)

Clause 27, which provides a new symbol to be known as a national tire safety mark, appears as an amendment to the Motor Vehicle Tire Safety Act. Clause 44 of the bill, which provides greater facility to the Registrar of Trade Marks, as an amendment to the Trade Marks Act, is designed to relieve a very substantial backlog of work in the office of the Registrar of Trade Marks. The first of those had been omitted because it had not been put forward prior to the original introduction of the bill, and the second was omitted pending advice as to the views of the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Reference was made earlier to the unique nature of this proposed legislation. The discovery of inaccuracies in any body of statutes is, of course, not unique, but an attempt such as that which is represented by this bill, where all parties were invited to participate, is considered, indeed, to be a new departure in democratic government and one which should result in a substantial improvement in the administration, not only in connection with social legislation but throughout the broad scope of Canada's statutes, dealing, as they must, with the country's rapid advances in scientific and social development.

Before concluding, I should like to refer honourable senators to two previous statements made on this subject, one made in the other place and one in this chamber. The first of these was made in June, 1975, in the other house by the then Minister of Justice, the Honourable Otto Lang. The second was made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate on May 19, 1976. In both statements details as to the means by which these errors were discovered were provided. It is interesting to recall what was then said.

It was said by both honourable gentlemen that letters had been dispatched to all members of Parliament, all senators, all federally appointed judges, all chief judges appointed provincially, deans of law schools, federal and provincial law reform commissions, the Uniform Law Conference, provincial Attorneys General, law societies and associations, and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, as well as to the deputy heads and chief executive officers of federal departments of government and legal officers in the Department of Justice, suggesting that the attention of the Department of Justice be drawn to instances of the sort mentioned that were observed from time to time in the Statutes of Canada.

As honourable senators will realize, the search for errors in the Statutes of Canada was an extensive one, and the result of that search, and the correction made in the present bill will in large measure improve the Statutes of Canada.

Senator Choquette: What role did the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, co-chaired by Senator Forsey, play in this?

Senator Langlois: That committee deals with quite a different subject matter. It is on the lookout for errors or excesses in orders in council and other statutory instruments. It is on the lookout, for example, for cases where orders in council and statutory instruments are ultra vires of the statutes under which they are made, which is quite a different matter. The present measure would correct possible errors in the statutes themselves in advance of the decennial consolidation of the Statutes of Canada. Instead of waiting for the decennial review in order to make corrections, it is hoped that it can be done on an annual basis.

On motion of Senator Grosart, for Senator Walker, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL UNITY

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.—(Honourable Senator McElman).

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator McElman, I ask leave to speak in this debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, Senator Perrault has given us, through the introduction of his motion and by way of his excellent introductory address, an opportunity to think and talk about our country such as has not been presented for a long time. Perhaps one of the causes of the difficulties we now face is that we do not stop frequently enough to consider deeply the nature of our country, the difficulties inherent in the governing of such a massive and thinly populated land and the fantastic potential which lies within our grasp were we only big enough individually and collectively to pursue it with energy and wisdom.

I have heard many of the speeches of honourable senators and, in any event, I have reread them all in preparation for my address today. May I make a suggestion to honourable senators? I suggest, in a completely non-partisan and co-operative way, that we produce a booklet containing the addresses already made and those yet to be made in this debate, and that that booklet be distributed not only to the media, the legislators, and the libraries of Canada, but to school children and university students. As each honourable senator speaks about his particular part of the country, I find a wealth of information and outlook which is not general knowledge across the country. I am afraid that each of us assumes that everyone else knows everything that he knows and, either through reticence or thoughtlessness, fails to communicate much of it to his colleagues and to others. One of the great documents of reconfederation could be a collection of these addresses.

As I make that suggestion, I hasten to propose that my own speech not be included. I am inclined to think that what I have already said is as important as anything I am likely to say in the course of this address.

We have already had three speakers who have touched in some measure on the question of education. Senator Rizzuto, Senator Steuart and Senator Carter have already tackled that subject from different points of view. When I heard Senator Carter's address on Monday night, it occurred to me that perhaps I should change the thrust of the speech I was preparing for today. But I have not done so because the fact that a number of us have considered the inadequacy of our educational system to be at the root of our problem is probably significant enough to warrant a deeper examination of that inadequacy, and what we are doing and what we may be able to do about it.

When the young teller at my bank in Toronto looked at me questioningly and said, "We don't have a Senate in Canada," I began to suspect that we were in trouble. When the bell-boy in an Ottawa hotel said, "Senator? What state are you from?" I knew we were in trouble.

It was not so much the lack of knowledge about our chamber that bothered me—one gets hardened to that—but when I questioned each of them as to where they had been educated and they said Toronto and Ottawa respectively; and when I asked them what they had been taught about our politics, our form of government, the various peoples who make up our country, the principles for which we stand as a nation, our history or any national personalities of the past or present, I drew a blank. Neither of them could recall anything. Then the teller recalled that once, when there was an election, they talked about that in class. She could not remember whether it was a provincial or federal election, or the issues or the outcome.

Let us make allowances. Perhaps these were not the brightest students in their classes. So I spoke to a young lady attending the University of Toronto. She was enrolled in honours Economics, and plans to go to the London School of Economics when she graduates. She is bright, intelligent, outgoing and charming. She is off to Turkey for the summer to work for a company through a university exchange program. So I asked her the same questions. She took some time to reflect on her academic career so far, and then she said "I don't really remember being taught anything about Canada in public school. In Grade 10 I learned about Champlain and all those people—about up to the First World War. I know there was a good Canadian history course in Grade 13, but I didn't take it. It was optional. And, of course, most of the kids left school in Grades 10 and 11 so they didn't even have the option".

I could hardly believe my ears. So I talked to a teacher. I asked why the children of Ontario never learned about the roots of the people of Newfoundland, about whom Senator Cook spoke so eloquently, and why the children of British Columbia had never heard of the Acadians, about whom Senator Michaud spoke so feelingly. I asked why our children had no idea of how they were governed, of the principles of democracy, of the names of the people who made this country live. The answer was so straightforward that the questions seemed ridiculous. She said, "How could the teachers teach those things? They have never learned them themselves. They are products of the same school system and their training as teachers has never even approached these subjects." I found her comment confirmed by a survey made by Professor Frank Simon of the University of Calgary in 1976. He surveyed the perceptions of Canadian educators with respect to social studies in general, and Canadian studies in particular. He said, "Although a perceived lack of curriculum materials coupled with didactic, fact-oriented, and textbook-dominated courses were in several provinces cited as weaknesses, the principal complaints were the inadequacy of pre-service and in-service training."

The next step was to go to the people who prescribe the curricula for the schools and run the teachers' colleges—the provincial departments of education. They each have a practice of writing annual reports. I studied the report from each province. Some reports set out the objectives of the educational system. In no case did the objectives include creating in their students an awareness of their country, of the responsibilities of citizens, of the rights of democratic peoples, of the cultures of their co-citizens. In most cases the only reference to such things in the annual report was a paragraph on social studies mentioning the Canadian society in passing, and in two or three cases there was also reference to their participation in the Young Voyageurs Program of the federal government. As far as Canada was concerned, that was it.

I am sure that everyone in this chamber has assumed that education has been improving since we were young. That was my assumption, and that is why I found it so hard to understand how the generation now entering the work force could have learned so little about their country. I decided I should look back to see what it was that I learned in public school that gave me the deep sense of the Canadian spirit which has attracted me toward public service all my life. I found that the old Ontario Fourth Reader, which I used in junior fourth and senior fourth—now Grades 7 and 8—and which was used as the standard reading textbook of Ontario schools well into the 1930s, contained as some of its prose exercise stories on the Battle of Hastings, the Battle of Bannockburn, The Discovery of America, Making Maple Sugar in Canada, The Mound Builders of Prehistoric North America, Heroes of the Long Sault, Lumbering in Canada, The Heroine of Verchères, The Battle for Quebec, Agriculture in Canada, The Founders of Upper Canada, and Canada and the United States—that was a speech by Joseph Howe. These were just reading exercises, but in themselves they provided a good overview of Canada from its roots. There was also poetry, which included a poem about Jacques Cartier written by D'Arcy McGee. Which of our Grade 7 and 8 pupils today even know who D'Arcy McGee was? There were other poems extolling the grandeur of the prairies, the beauty of the Thousand Islands and other Canadian subjects. The old spelling book contained as exercises excerpts from an essay on Brock of Queenston Heights, a speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and excerpts from the records of various events in Canadian history.

Compare these with the sophisticated texts in use today, and then ask yourselves which are most likely to turn out people having a genuine love of Canada, its traditions, its ideals, its background and an appreciation of the great historical and human events from which we were formed.

Eagerness to conform with the latest fashions in education which had promised much in American systems moved our provincial ministries to import theoreticians and curriculum advisers—people professionally recognized, but who had no commitment to the idea and ideals of Canada. They came, and were ensconced in temples dedicated to the great god Education by ambitious ministries which were anxious to become identified with its most sophisticated priesthood, and which handed our future citizenry over to them for formation. The experiment has not been a happy one, and since 1970 the concerns have become deeper and more articulate.

[Translation]

But at least up to this moment I thought everyone agreed that it was a good idea to make changes in the situation, to start finding ways of educating young people about Canada. But I was disappointed. Recently, the Government of Quebec banned the use in Quebec schools of the game "O! Canada". That game helps give students a knowledge of both official languages and all of Canada.

Mr. Lévesque has said before that the debate leading to the referendum would be open and free to give Quebecers an opportunity to decide that important question democratically. But now, his government is beginning to limit the kind of information available to make an intelligent choice.

However, the decision of the Quebec government to ban the game "O! Canada" in Quebec schools is only the natural culmination of the ignorance of our national heritage on the part of all provinces of Canada.

In asserting the ban of the game "O! Canada", Jacques-Yvan Morin, the Quebec Minister of Education, said that on the pretense of encouraging bilingualism that game actually teaches children a certain image of Canada that helps promote national unity. So the game was banned!

If teaching children bilingualism and the knowledge of their country is considered dangerous propaganda, one can see how the Lévesque government wants to keep young Quebecers in ignorance of their birthright that they share with all other Canadians.

Is it possible to move further away from the concept of a courageous and new country extending from one sea to the other, made up of both founding races, much enriched by different peoples who are not afraid of truth but who are very afraid that it should be kept from them?

I am very pleased to know that teachers, children and parents in Quebec asked for that game in increasing numbers since the ban. Quebecers will not submit to that kind of censorship. They know that independence based on such tactics would be a meaningless victory.

● (1450)

[English]

But is it worse for a province consciously to ban such materials than it is for others, consciously or unconsciously, to ignore it? I doubt it. And English-speaking provinces have been doing that ever since Manitoba illegally barred the use of French in its schools in 1890.

Not until 1976 did Ontario issue a guideline on Canadian studies which at least began to define the obligation of its school system to teach children some basic information about their country. The curricula of the schools in British Columbia are still almost bare of any such influence. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Saskatchewan have improved greatly in the last two years. But it is hard to believe that a country to whom God has been so good can have been so negligent in its stewardship as to permit its children, its most sacred charge, to grow up ignorant of their heritage and of each other, unmindful of their opportunity for brotherhood and unprepared for the challenge which lies before them.

There are signs of hope. In 1970 the Canada Studies Foundation was organized under the chairmanship of the Honourable Walter L. Gordon. There was good reason for its formation. A. B. Hodgett had just written What Culture? What Heritage?, after surveying the extent of Canadian studies in Canadian schools. He had said that high school graduates:

—have found very little in the Canadian past which is interesting and meaningful to them and practically no source of inspiration in their cultural heritage. They are future citizens without deep roots, lacking in historical perspective and only vaguely aware of traditions that have by no means outlived their usefulness. Contrary to clearly stated national goals in education, they develop an apathy toward Canadian history which tends to influence adversely their feelings toward modern Canada. By continuing to tolerate antiquated materials, by using methods that so often produce attitudes the very opposite of those desired, by functioning as autonomous units in society, by overemphasizing provincial concerns and inadvertently neglecting legitimate national interests, the schools are reinforcing unwarranted, as distinct from natural and desirable, regional feelings. Canadian studies do not give to most of our young people a constructive sense of belonging to a unique, identifiable civic culture.

Set up with the endorsement of the Council of Ministers of Education, and financed by private sources and the Canada Council, the foundation is an experiment in voluntary inter-provincial co-operation, unique in the history of Canadian education. Our own Senator Lamontagne is on the board of directors of the foundation.

It has been a success and, when I said earlier that there has been a visible improvement in the emphasis on Canadian studies in the various school systems, the foundation should be given a good share of the credit for that fact.

During the year ended June 1, 1977, the foundation ran nine projects, three of them francophone, one bilingual and five anglophone. Each project had to have representation from at least three regions of Canada and, in fact, the projects had an average representation of seven provinces and involved over 400 teachers. The emphasis was on increasing the professional development of a relatively large number of teachers across Canada and their capacity to deal effectively with Canadian studies.

For the last two years the foundation has been financed by the Council of Ministers of Education of the provinces and matching grants by the Secretary of State. Now there has been so much bickering among the provincial ministers, and unwillingness to accept the expense of any project not strictly limited to their respective provinces, that the Council of Ministers has cut back its support by two-thirds, and has advised that it does not intend to continue its support next year. The Secretary of State, although the financing is supposed to be on the basis of matching grants, has managed to find the money to keep the federal contribution at its original level for the coming year. The foundation is now winding down its operations and will be out of existence in June 1978. What a tragedy at the very time that we need such an organization most! What a reason to disband it—pettiness and provincialism, the devils which plague us even in our most difficult hour!

If the Canadian Studies Foundation is to pass into oblivion then its task must be picked up by someone—by co-operation among the provincial ministries, by the Secretary of State, by a new agency, someone. Someone must see that a good book on Canadian studies is published. Someone must see that a catalogue of resource material on Canadian studies is prepared. Someone must see that there are physical exchanges of teachers and students among the provinces. A young man teaching about the prairies in a geography class in Newfoundland without ever having seen the prairies found that his whole attitude and behaviour was transformed after he worked on a project in Westlock, Alberta.

There are some things which simply have to be done regardless of cost. They are a matter of survival. If we should be so fortunate as to work ourselves out of our present difficulty, we must resolve never again to allow our country to be endangered by dereliction of duty toward our children.

Quebec Cultural Affairs Minister Camille Laurin has indicated that Quebec might consider a solution to language education based on agreement among the provinces. This may be the beginning of a useful idea. But if provinces are to retain exclusive jurisdiction in education in the future, then the provinces will have to agree upon much more than language education. One of the conditions of any new Confederation pact must be a firm undertaking by each province to inculcate and cultivate among our citizens a sense of solidarity based on knowledge, understanding and appreciation of the cultures and aspirations of each other.

On motion of Senator McDonald, debate adjourned.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

VISIT OF DELEGATION OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS TO MEXICO, MARCH 21 TO 28, 1977—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 17, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Molgat, calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of a delegation of Canadian parliamentarians to Mexico, from 21st to 28th March, 1977.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, rarely do I listen to myself twice in the same day, but I would ask for your indulgence on this occasion.

I should like, first of all, to express my sincere thanks for having been chosen to form part of the Canadian parliamentary delegation which went to Mexico from March 21 to 28, 1977. As was well explained by Senator Molgat, the co-leader of the delegation, this was a most representative group of all parts of Canada.

If the visit to Mexico was a real success, I believe it was due to two things—first, the excellent briefing we received from the officials and the homework which we had all done in order to familiarize ourselves with the facts and figures pertaining to these most important discussions; and secondly, the calibre of the composition of the delegation and, surely, not last but one of the most important, the good leadership given by Senator Molgat, and Mr. Gus MacFarlane representing the House of Commons. If we were able to accomplish so much, I think it is due to their preparedness, and their ability to lead the delegation and have everyone take part in the discussions.

It is not my intention to repeat what was so ably said by Senator Molgat in his presentation, but I would like honourable senators to view this matter in the context of Mexican history.

Mexico has 61 million citizens. It had an annual population growth of 3.4 per cent in 1975, and its economic growth was 6.7 per cent for the same year.

Since the 1920 revolution, the same Institutional Revolutionary Party has controlled Mexican politics. The present President, José Lopez Portillo, assumed office in 1976. If the office becomes vacant during the first two years a general election must be held. After two years Congress can choose a successor to complete the term. Congress comprises a Chamber of Deputies with 210 members, elected for three years by universal suffrage, and a Senate composed of 64 members, two from each state and the federal district, elected for a period of six years. Each of the 31 states has its own constitution, government, legislature and judicial officers, but the President appoints the mayor of the federal district.

Twelve other Presidents have had a six-year term of office. Under the Mexican constitution the President can be elected for only one term in his lifetime; similarly, a mayor cannot be elected for more than three years, a member of the Congress for more than three years, and a senator for more than six years. They have the prerogative of dropping out of politics or joining the executive branches and running for another position after three years, but after a second period as mayor, member of Congress or senator, they cannot be re-elected.

For a long time the Mexican economy depended on natural resources and plantation crops. However, in the 20th century a more diversified economy has been developed. The percentage of workers employed in agriculture and related activities has decreased from 83 per cent in 1921 to less than 50 per cent to date. The importance of mining has also declined in comparison to manufacturing.

As was said by Senator Molgat, in 1938 a policy of Mexicanization was introduced, which reserved certain sections of the economy for Mexicans and required 51 per cent Mexican control in many other areas. In the early 1960s, the government purchased a number of American-owned utility companies and began prodding foreign-owned mining companies to take in Mexican partners.

In May 1973, a new law respecting foreign investment was adopted, limiting foreigners to 49 per cent ownership in most new ventures. Among other things, it also required foreign investors to obtain official permission to acquire more than 25 per cent of the stock in a local company or 45 per cent of its fixed assets. Key industries such as oil, basic petrochemicals, most mining, electric power, railroads and communications became officially government monopolies. Activities such as radio and television broadcasting, sea and air transport, and land development were reserved for Mexicans under the new law. Although the rhetoric of Mexican policy on foreign investment is often strident, the application of the rules is generally realistic, and most of the provisions of the investment law have been official Mexican policy for some time.

The Mexican government also adopted a law to insure that foreign technology is used as an instrument of development and not as a means of domination. Thus, the import of technology is restricted if it is already available at the same price in Mexico. It also forbids companies to enter agreements with foreign parent companies if the contract restricts production or prices of goods made in Mexico, or if the terms oblige the Mexican buyer of technology to purchase materials or the equivalent from the seller.

Despite various provisions of the Mexican law on foreign investment a number of factors still favour Canadian-Mexican trade. A major factor contributing to trade between the two countries is the complementary nature of the two economic systems, particularly as it concerns the agricultural production cycle. The bulk of Mexico's exports to Canada are perishable fruit and vegetable commodities, while Canada exports auto parts, paper, asbestos and railway equipment. Mexico embarked on a program of rehabilitating its railroad network in the 1960s and the Dominion Steel and Coal Company of Canada—DOSCO—received orders for steel rails and track accessories totalling some $100 million. The main difficulty in Mexico's trade with Canada is its lack of diversification. Mexico would like to export more manufactured goods to Canada.

Both delegations held working sessions in Mexico City, during which they exchanged points of view on Canada-Mexico relations, trade balance, tourism, air transport, exchange of young technicians, migrant workers in agriculture, fisheries, the new international economic order, the defence of prices of raw materials, development financing, cultural relations and energy.

Both delegations agreed that the relations between the two countries have been strengthened and improved. They pointed out the importance and usefulness of the interparliamentary meetings to consolidate friendship between these two countries, and expressed willingness to continue holding these meetings. They also reaffirmed their conviction that meetings of heads of governments are valuable means of furthering understanding and co-operation between countries.

The Canadian and Mexican delegations exchanged points of view on tourism, and stressed its importance for the economy of both countries since it generates employment, increases foreign exchange and is a factor for better understanding among people. In 1975, approximately 200,000 Canadians visited Mexico and approximately 35,000 Mexicans visited Canada.

The two delegations examined with special attention the need to better utilize energy resources and to co-operate in research of new sources of energy. We were pleased to hear the announcement of recent discoveries of large deposits of oil in Mexico. Based on conservative figures, they have a proven potential of 60 billion barrels of oil, and there is a strong possibility that it may go as high as 90 billion barrels. In this context, the Mexicans will become the Arabs of North America. They look forward to an agreement being reached for the exportation of Mexican oil to Canada in exchange for our eastern coal.

It was my observation that as a result of these large oil deposits on their soil, the Mexican people have found a new pride and a greater hope to improve and standardize the way of living of its people. I had the pleasure of visiting Mexico in 1969 with the Honourable John Turner, and at that time I did not find the happiness and the hope now shining in the eyes of all Mexicans.

On my 1969 visit I assessed the former President, Luis Echeverría Alvarez, as a politician of the extreme left, and I believe it was because of his political philosophy that he did everything he could to associate his country with the Third World non-aligned group of underdeveloped countries.

Senator Molgat mentioned that we had the privilege of meeting the new President, José Lopez Portillo. This President impressed me as being a well-matured politician. In exchanging views with Mexican senators, I was led to believe that the President will not carry all his eggs in one basket. The Mexicans have already soft-pedalled their association with the Third World, and it is my view that their future lies more in their attitude and ability to negotiate bilateral trade than going through the merry-go-round of multilateral agreements.

I noticed a sincere desire on the part of Mexican congressmen and senators to open up a new door of goodwill on the Western nations. They are still convinced that they must continue their association with the Organization of American States. In my opinion, their role will be more as an actor and not as a passive spectator in international affairs.

Moreover, several new orientations can be seen in the President's activities in the international arena. There was an effort to escape from traditional foreign ties, particularly the ever-present American influence, by broadening the scope of diplomatic relations to include more distant countries or ones with which Mexico previously had no national links.

Mexico has served as a focal point for two continuing but important international questions, those of nuclear arms testing and protection of the marine environment. The Treaty of Tlatcloclo has been successful in preventing the spread of nuclear weapons into Latin America and all the nuclear powers, except the U.S.S.R., have now signed protocols to the treaty. Mexico's recent interest in closer ties with Australia reflects in part its concern about French nuclear testing in the South Pacific while, at the same time, its public stance has been more moderate than that of some others, such as New Zealand and Peru.

What is perhaps most significant is the fact that President Echeverria made a novel attempt to portray Mexico as a member, if not a leader, of the Third World, although it does not fit neatly into either the developed or underdeveloped category of nations. He proposed an international charter of economic rights and duties of states at the 1972 UNCTAD Conference in Santiago. This raised considerable interest in the Third World, where the desire to have an economic parallel to the United Nations Charter on Human Rights is one that strikes a very sympathetic note among many underdeveloped countries.

Honourable senators, I would like to say briefly that I was glad of the opportunity to be part of a delegation which has, in my opinion, opened up new fields of endeavour for our country. I am grateful to Senator Molgat and Mr. McFarlane for having enabled me to make the last speech at the banquet given by the Minister of External Affairs in the enormous room of their new art centre. Among the cultured assembly were several ambassadors from various countries, including ours, His Excellency James Langley, and his wife. The ambassador gave each of us a lot of help and support for which we were truly grateful.

I would also like to mention that we had the privilege of being accompanied during our stay in Mexico by the new Mexican ambassador to Canada, His Excellency Augustin Barrios Gomez, who has just arrived in Ottawa.

This banquet inaugurated the centre and closed the official part of our trade exchanges, and I would be grateful if I could be allowed to include as an appendix to Hansard the notes that I used for my speech since the Minister of External Affairs of Mexico asked me after I was finished to include it in the report of our Canada-Mexico visit.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of address see Appendix, p. 872.)

On motion of Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 13, 1977, at 8 p.m.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ADDRESS BY SENATOR RHÉAL BÉLISLE TO THIRD INTERPARLIAMENTARY

MEETING BETWEEN MEXICO AND CANADA, MARCH 24, 1977

[English]

Honourable Secretary of Foreign Relations, Your Excellencies, honourable colleagues of Mexico and Canada, ladies, gentlemen and friends: I am very pleased to be given the opportunity to say to you thank you and to close these important discussions which we had with your officials and colleagues of Mexico on the most vital issues of economic co-operation and development. More progress must be achieved in these areas if we are to succeed. Time is always an important asset in the field of diplomatic agreements, but time for our developing nations is becoming short.

To say to you, Hon. Minister, and through you to all those ministers and ministries involved in our visit a sincere thank you is just performing an act of politeness.

My colleagues and I from Canada have been so impressed by your generosity, your hospitality, your openness and the bona fide desire of the Mexican people to work, cooperate and enrich their standard of life that we Canadians will leave no stone unturned, will remove all obstacles within our power to see the reality of a better understanding, a mutual co-operation of industrial development.

Having established firmly in our minds the principle of economics, we must involve in a struggle to develop our countries with the bilateral and multilateral agreements at our disposition.

At no time, Mr. Minister, have we found it necessary to emphasize that Canada is not seeking preferential treatment or special advantages... for this would be contrary to our principle of freedom to negotiate with one or with all.

If we do not find solutions to our trade problems now, we may be doing ourselves and our children a great disservice. If we regard this as an adversary one, we should be foolish as well, for solutions are not beyond our reach.

We know in our hearts what has to be done, even if we have not yet found in our minds the way it can be done.

The key, as in all accomplishments of worth, lies within the scope of individual men and women. It is found in their attitude towards others. The role of leadership today is to encourage the embrace of global ethics, ethics which abhor the present imbalance in basic human conditions... an imbalance in access to health care, to a nutritious diet, to shelter, to education, ethics which extend to all men, to all spaces, and through all time, ethics which are based on confidence in one's fellowman; confidence that, with imagination and discipline, the operation of the present world economic structure can be revised to reflect more accurately the needs of today and tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. President, we are pleased to be here at the southernmost point on the North American continent in this Mexican land so rich in history, which has seen the birth of so many proud Mexicans who contributed so generously to the advancement of Mexican culture and thereby to the culture of mankind, not only in the past centuries but also in the contemporary world.

Even though my presence here has to do with commercial and economic matters, I have always entertained the idea of evolution in cultural matters and this process of evolution of ideas. I am convinced that each of us, be he Mexican or Canadian, can and must have an impact on world thought. Monetary considerations are the subject of the day in general, specially since the oil crisis of 1973, but I am one of those who believe that there are other values to existence and survival than money.

Our moral values, our national pride and, above all, the significance we attach to tolerance, be it at home or on alien soil, is becoming and should become the barometer of world conscience.

Honourable ministers, senators and parliamentarians of Mexico, you have done your utmost to make our stay as pleasant and agreeable as possible, and by inviting our spouses to accompany us you have just revived the old proverb which says that a man who sleeps well, who gets a good night's rest, does better things the morning after.

When we were given the privilege of visiting your Parliament yesterday morning, what impressed me most besides the warm remarks made by those who spoke is the way you honour your flag and that inscription on top of it.

The Fatherland comes First.

And above your flag, I read this inscription:

Between individuals as among nations, let respect for individual rights be peace.

During our visit to your cultural arts centre, we were told that the Flower symbolizes Hope, and the Flame represents the Revolution.

Since we have been receiving much from Providence by locating in the North American context, we like to think that we are a young nation moved by a spirit of cooperation much more than grandeur. We wish to be guided by your flower of hope rather than the flame of ambition.

We accept the flame as a symbol in the context only of the International Olympic Games.

We have had the privilege of such a pleasant and fruitful visit full of promise for common understanding, thanks to the visits by our predecessors in this venture, your former President and our Prime Minister, and especially to the discreet though very efficient work of our ambassadors. In my view, they are the leaven that seeds, plans and develops the bonds of friendship and understanding between our two countries.

Although they do not make the headlines, their actions and good work stem from their good will and love of country. As long as we have such men, our two countries' cause will not only be protected but enhanced.

To conclude, I would like to tell our guests that this must not be our last supper. Within the Christian context in which we all grew, the Last Supper laid the seed of a Supper that must go on taking place as it has for two thousand years, and we Canadians will always be very happy to open the goodness of our hearts as you have done in such a marvellous way.

Your kindness, your unfailing attention to the needs of each and every one of us will no doubt remain the cement, the mortar that will help build a structure of cooperation, understanding and friendship making our two peoples the pyramids of industrial expansion between our two countries.

[English]

And now, ladies and gentlemen, permit me to offer to you, on behalf of the Canadian delegation, a small token of our appreciation. It is small but we hope that you and many Mexican senators and members of Congress will come to Canada to receive the balance of our gratitude.

We Canadians owe also a great debt of gratitude to His Excellency Rafael Urdaneta, your Ambassador to Canada, for the wonderful contribution he has made in representing so ably your government. His many years of service in Canada contributed largely to promoting cultural and economic ties which brought 225,000 Canadian tourists to Mexico in 1976. We hope that you will come back and enjoy the hospitality of Canadians and of your successor, whose company we have already appreciated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, June 14, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LOANS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES—QUESTION

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government the following question, a copy of which I have already given him.

(1) How much, on what dates, at what interest rates, and for how long, has Canada loaned, advanced, and transferred money as foreign aid or help or for whatever reasons, from January 1, 1945, to December 31, 1976, to what foreign countries?

(2) How much of it has been repaid by what countries and on what dates during the same period?

(3) How much has been written off or erased without payment, on what dates, for what countries, during the same period, and for what reason?

(4) On what authority have such write-offs been given?

Senator Perrault: I wish to thank the honourable senator for providing me with prior notice of this question. However, I am unable as yet to provide the information. The question is a detailed one, and so I must take it as notice.

Senator Flynn: I thought you would have the answer at your fingertips.

THE SENATE

TRAVEL ARRANGEMENTS FOR SENATORS—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, having in mind the problem of making travel arrangements, can the Leader of the Government say whether it is now definite that the Senate will sit on Friday of this week?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we hope to have more information regarding that situation tomorrow morning. I am unable to state at this moment that we shall be sitting on Friday, but there is a good chance of it. That is all I can say at the moment. The flow of bills from the other place is such that if several additional ones come here, we may be called upon to sit not only this Friday but on Friday of the following week.

We went through a long period of what might be described as a legislative drought, and now there is a deluge. As honourable senators have seen this evening, we have had four bills introduced here after being dealt with in the other place. We may know the situation better tomorrow morning.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if I might ask the leader another question flowing from his comment that we might sit a week from Friday, which I understood was a day when customarily Parliament did not sit?

Senator Perrault: Thank you very much for drawing that to my attention. Of course we will not be sitting on St. Jean Baptiste day, or on any holiday of that kind; but the point to be made is that there will very possibly be extra sittings between now and the end of the month. Thank you for drawing that to my attention.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I share the same problem as other senators with regard to making travel arrangements at this time of year. Some of us have already found that the travel situation is beginning to get very difficult because of the mass movements taking place across Canada. If we sit on Friday of this week, will it be a morning sitting, an afternoon sitting or both?

Senator Flynn: Friday night, most likely.

Senator Perrault: I cannot say the exact time we may sit, but I should think that honourable senators would like to have the afternoon for travel, if that can be arranged. At some point this evening I should like to discuss this situation with the Leader of the Opposition to see if we can organize our work this week so that it will be unnecessary to sit on Friday.

THE SENATE CHAMBER

TAKING OF PHOTOGRAPHS BY THE PUBLIC—QUESTION

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. My question stems from the confusion which exists regarding permission for visitors to Parliament to photograph the Senate chamber when the Senate is not sitting. There are many complaints, particularly on the part of young visitors, about the restrictions on taking photographs in the Senate chamber. These young people from across Canada who come to visit Parliament, sometimes at their own expense and sometimes at the expense of school fund drives, are allowed to take pictures in the lobbies, the foyer and the chamber of the House of Commons on any day and at any time when that house is not sitting, but, I am informed, when they visit the Senate they are allowed to take pictures only at certain times during the weekend.

I wonder what the purpose behind this is, if it is true. Here we have these thousands of young people travelling from all over Canada to see not only the other place but this esteemed chamber as well. I would ask the Leader of the Government if it is true that visitors are not allowed to take pictures of the Senate chamber on days, as the officials say, when the Senate is sitting. Today, for example, they could not take pictures because the Senate was sitting tonight.

I ask the leader if this is not discrimination of the worst type, and is it not bad public relations for the Senate if these young people, and visitors in general, are denied permission to take pictures of our chamber and the foyer at a time when the Senate is not actually sitting?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, I would appreciate receiving from you any specific complaints which you may have received with respect to this alleged prohibition against picture taking. I must, however, state that it is my understanding that in recent months regulations with respect to picture taking in Parliament have generally been relaxed. It may well be that the prohibitions of which you speak exist, but that there may be good reasons for them. I have noted with interest the great numbers of young people who come to Parliament Hill—more, I think, than in any other year—and I believe this is a trend that is to be encouraged. While it is clearly desirable for as many young people as possible to see the buildings on Parliament Hill, and both the Senate and the other place, it may be that if unrestricted photography were to be permitted here on any day, that process could well slow the flow of visitors who want to see Parliament. There may be good reasons for a restriction or even prohibition of picture taking at certain times. There may be a good reason for this restriction or prohibition, because it takes some time to take pictures. The element of time may be the reason for a prohibition. I can only suggest that I am prepared to undertake an inquiry to see whether the desired information is available.

At the same time, I would appreciate receiving information from any senator who may have received complaints of the nature outlined by Senator Riley so that the matter may be discussed.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Could there possibly be any reason why the privileges granted to these young people in respect of the House of Commons are not granted in respect of the Senate?

Senator Flynn: Madam Speaker may also take that question as notice.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Steuart moved the third reading of Bill C-13, to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS BILL

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 8, the debate on the motion of Senator Goldenberg for the second reading of Bill C-25, to extend the present laws in Canada that proscribe discrimination and that protect the privacy of individuals.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, in recent years Canada has been undergoing a great transformation. The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada—of which some senators, including myself, were members—in its report, tabled in Parliament on March 16, 1972, defined the Canadian reality and identity of today as “an independent, democratic, officially bilingual, multicultural, federal state.”

A new Constitution was recommended for Canada which, in its preamble, should include the following basic objectives:

1. To establish a federal system of government within a democratic society;
2. To protect and enhance basic human rights;
3. To develop Canada as a bilingual and multicultural country in which all its citizens, male and female, young and old, native peoples and Métis, and all groups from every ethnic origin feel equally at home;

4. To promote economic, social and cultural equality for all Canadians as individuals, and to reduce regional economic disparities;

5. To present Canada as a pluralistic mosaic, a free and open society which challenges the talents of her people;

6. To seek world peace and security, and international social progress.

Canada has made great progress in the realization of these objectives, particularly in the field of human rights. She was a signatory of the United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, and, last year, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of the United Nations, as well as the Helsinki Declaration in 1975.

The Canadian Parliament enshrined the basic principles of freedom and human rights in the Canadian Bill of Rights of 1960, under the leadership of the then Prime Minister, the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker. Hailed as a great milestone in the struggle against discrimination, that document was, however, limited in its application by courts in the interpretation of federal laws. Many law authorities claim that its implementation lacks enforceability—or “teeth,” to use popular jargon.

Subsequently, the Federal-Provincial Conference of 1968, under the leadership of Prime Minister Pierre E. Trudeau, considered the adoption of a constitutional charter of human rights, but an agreement could not be reached with all of the provinces. The Victoria Charter of 1971 included many fundamental rights, but it also did not win the approval of all the provinces. That was a set-back for human rights in Canada, but not for long.

The present government introduced the Canadian Human Rights Bill last year, which was piloted by the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Ron Basford, who secured the co-operation of all the parties in the other house. Bill C-25 was thoroughly examined in committee, where several amendments were adopted with the approval of the minister. It has come to the Senate, after an amendment brought in by the official opposition was defeated on third reading in the other chamber.

The sponsor of Bill C-25 in this chamber, Senator Goldenberg, is a recognized constitutional lawyer, who was involved as special counsel regarding the charter of human rights at the Federal-Provincial Conferences of 1968 and 1971. Unquestionably, he is an outstanding authority in this field. His explanation of the principles of the bill was objective, factual and full, for which lucid presentation he is to be heartily congratulated. It has made my task as a critic relatively easy.

I agree with Senator Goldenberg that this is a very important bill, and one which is long overdue. For the first time in our history we have an anti-discrimination code at the federal level, and for the first time Canadian citizens will have the right to obtain access to personal information about themselves in the files of the federal government.

To remind honourable senators, the first basic principle of this legislation is found in clause 2(a), which reads:

—every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have, consistent with his or her obligations as a member of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex or marital status, or conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted or by discriminatory employment practices based on physical handicap.

● (2030)

The other principle of the bill is enunciated in clause 2(b):

—the privacy of individuals and their right of access to records containing personal information concerning them for any purpose including the purpose of ensuring accuracy and completeness should be protected to the greatest extent consistent with the public interest.

The bill makes certain provisions for the implementation of these principles. A Canadian Human Rights Commission will be established. It will consist of a chief commissioner, a deputy chief commissioner and at least three, but no more than six, other commissioners. Although an independent body, members of the commission may be removed by the Governor in Council on address by the Senate and the House of Commons. The commission is empowered to administer the act and to issue binding guidelines and regulations. Up to 12 regional offices may be established, each with panels that will be less than the full commission. It will be able to conduct research for informational and educational purposes.

Furthermore, a Privacy Commissioner will be designated, who will be a special member of the Human Rights Commission. His role will be to provide a review procedure for individuals who consider that their rights have been infringed by the commission. The Privacy Commissioner will be required to establish a procedure readily accessible for all individuals, expeditious in its performance and at reasonable cost to the individual and Canadian taxpayers. The final decision, however, will be left with the minister, who will be accountable to Parliament, to which he must report if he refuses to act on the recommendation of the Privacy Commissioner. Thus, the Privacy Commissioner is intended to be an effective check on the use or abuse of the power of the minister.

That, briefly, is the extent of the legislation. The rights are defined precisely and clearly, not as is usually the case in complicated legalistic terminology but in simple terms understandable to the average citizen. It is a functional piece of legislation, because a mechanism will be established not only to deal effectively with cases of discrimination, but also to promote the observance of human rights in the Canadian society. In this respect it brings us in line with other democracies, such as the United States, Sweden and the Federal Republic of Germany, and well ahead of other countries with parliamentary systems.

Mindful of some of its shortcomings, we, Her Majesty's loyal opposition in the Senate, approve Bill C-25 in principle and warmly welcome it. It is a significant step in the direction of the exercise of democratic rights which are basic in Canadian society. I personally welcome this measure as a giant leap forward, because it greatly enhances the fundamental values of our democracy, making them more meaningful to the citizen.

This legislation respecting human rights is a significant part of the constitutional process in Canada. I refer again to the Final Report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, which recommends that the basic objectives of the Canadian federal democracy be enunciated in the preamble to the Canadian Constitution which, in broad terms, would state what kind of a country Canada is and what she aspires to be. The report distinguishes the Canadian nation as:

—a free people in a free society; a country characterized by rich diversity, in linguistic communities, cultural heritages, and regional identities; a country where individual fulfilment is the fundamental goal of society; and a country where individual Canadians look to the state not simply as a vehicle by which to serve their own self-interest, but as a vehicle by which they can contribute to the well-being of other Canadians.

I believe that the Canadian Bill of Rights of 1960 and the Canadian Human Rights Act of 1977 should become an integral part of the new Canadian Constitution, which is now in the making, but should not be unnecessarily delayed in view of the critical situation with Quebec.

Furthermore, we are aware that discrimination is practised in Canada in many forms. The press frequently reports many incidents of racial prejudice and discrimination, particularly against those of a different colour and cultural background, such as the Chinese, Japanese, East Indians, Pakistanis, and others. Some of these incidents of racism lead to violence and riots. Bill 1, which is now before the Quebec legislature, outrightly discriminates against English and other languages and those groups which are not French. I am sure that each of us is aware of incidents of various forms of discrimination, which are a painful source of discontent and trouble. Many of us have been victims of discrimination. If we asked for documentation of discriminatory practices and incidents, a committee would have to sit for a long time to produce it.

Bill C-25 goes a long way in dealing with discrimination, and eliminating many of its practices and preventing them in the future. It is our duty and task to make this legislation as effective as possible. Therefore, I agree with the sponsor, Senator Goldenberg, that it should go to committee, where it can be examined clause by clause and, where necessary, improvements made.

Here I shall mention only a few matters that should receive the attention of the committee. One is the right of final appeal to the Federal Court, which I understand is available but very expensive. Would not a special individual right of appeal be to the advantage of a citizen?

Certain grounds of discrimination, such as language, political affiliation, sexual orientation and physical handicap, generally and not only in employment matters, have been excluded from this legislation. Although the Official Languages Act of 1969 protects both English and French as official languages at the federal level, the other languages spoken throughout Canada and taught in our educational system, such as Italian, German, Ukrainian, and others, have no rights and no protection from discrimination.

I also want to raise a thorny issue, which is another exception in this bill. Clause 63(2) states:

Nothing in this Act affects any provision of the Indian Act or any provision made under or pursuant to that Act.

There is outright discrimination in the Indian Act, on the basis of blood, against women. Indian women who marry white men lose their rights on the reserve, while white women marrying Indian men have their rights on the reserve. This has very serious implications regarding the equality of sexes. If the proposed Canadian Human Rights Act is to be effective and applicable to all Canadian citizens, then all acts of the Canadian Parliament must be amended accordingly, and this includes the Immigration Bill, which is now before Parliament and which contains certain discriminatory features.

There are other shortcomings and weaknesses in this bill which should be thoroughly discussed in committee with the Minister of Justice and officials of his department. We know that legislation will not eliminate discrimination entirely but it can be a very effective deterrent, even in subtle instances. We have to ensure that there will not be any loopholes that could make mockery of certain sections, so that the public will have full confidence in the laws of the land.

Above all, what is most important is the spirit behind the Canadian human rights legislation which motivates the government and the members of both houses of Parliament. We should give to our citizens the best legislation that we are capable of producing—legislation which will enshrine our dedication to human rights. Today this is a great force in humanity, and will be the centre of attention at the Review Conference of the Helsinki Declaration at Belgrade, Yugoslavia, this week. This proposed act will be our commitment to the universal principles of freedom and democracy, truth and justice, equality and brotherhood, and peace for all men and women and all peoples of the world.

Senator Forsey: I wonder if I might ask Senator Yuzyk a question, the answer to which I ought to know, but do not. What was the amendment of the official opposition in the other place that was voted down?

Senator Yuzyk: It was an amendment brought forward by Mr. Woolliams. The proposed amendment, in essence, was that there should be a special appeals tribunal in those cases where a citizen did not feel he or she received justice from the Human Rights Commission. That amendment, as you said, was voted down.

On motion of Senator Forsey, debate adjourned.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Carter, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, for the second reading of the Bill C-26, intituled: "An Act respecting the organization of certain scientific activities of the Government of Canada".—(Honourable Senator Grosart).

Senator Grosart: Stand.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Honourable Senator Grosart would allow me to speak to this item now as I will not be here much during the course of the coming week.

Senator Grosart: Of course.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (2040)

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I have to start out by saying that I am rather skeptical of the usefulness of the legislative changes contained in Bill C-26. We have had a National Research Council operating in Canada now for about 60 years with an enviable record indeed. This council has conducted research in its own laboratories, it has supported university research throughout the country and, more recently, has given substantial support to industrial research in Canada. The guiding principle of the National Research Council, at least insofar as the support of individuals and of university research is concerned, as enunciated by Dr. Tory many, many years ago, was that you should find the good, young scientists and support them in doing what they wanted to do, and in that way you would build a nation of good scientists. Indeed, I think the National Research Council's record in this respect has been exemplary.

I did not know Dr. Tory, but I have heard that same thesis repeated on more than one occasion by Dr. C. J. MacKenzie and Dr. Steacie, who were subsequent presidents of the National Research Council.

It might not be an exaggeration to say—and if it is an exaggeration it is only a slight one—that the National Research Council fellowship program practically created the modern scientists in Canada's universities.

Furthermore, the National Research Council, although it was interested in supporting curiosity-oriented or basic research, did not neglect more practical research, or mission-oriented research as it is popular to refer to it today. One only has to look at the many practical achievements which have come out of the NRC laboratories and which have been made by others both in university and in industry in conjunction with NRC, achievements which have resulted in practical solutions to the problems of Canadian business, industry, agriculture and many other activities today. I would mention the admi-nable record that the National Research Council had working with others and in its own laboratories in the development of radar and electronics during World War II and, indeed, in the beginnings of atomic physics research at the same time.

The Canada Council was created by an act of Parliament passed 20 years ago. For nearly all of the past 20 years the Canada Council has been supporting, by similar methods, research and production in the arts and research and scholarship and inquiry in the humanities and social sciences.

It is now alleged that there has recently been some dissatisfaction—or it must be inferred that there has because of the very existence of this legislation—with the National Research Council and the Canada Council. And there has been. What is the reason? Simply that the demands upon NRC and the Canada Council for their fellowships, their research grants, their support of research and scholarly activities in universities and elsewhere have not been able to be met by the budgets which have been made available to them.

I submit that any dissatisfaction with NRC and the Canada Council has been almost entirely budgetary, and is not due to other or more sinister causes. Bill C-26 presumes to solve this problem by removing the granting function from the National Research Council and placing it in the hands of a newly created Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council. And it splits the Canada Council essentially into an arts council and a council dealing with the social sciences and humanities. Neither of these actions will in themselves have any effect on the budgetary problems of the two councils.

Nay! I am wrong. They will have some effect. They will make it necessary to support duplicate hierarchies of administrators and bureaucrats at the top of the granting agencies concerned, four of them instead of two, which should draw off some money that would otherwise be available to support scholarly research and scholarly activities both within and outside the universities.

If the budgets of the Canada Council and of the National Research Council had been allowed to grow as they ought to have grown in this country, comparable to the other OECD nations, for example, then I do not believe that the dissatisfaction which some people have expressed in relation to the National Research Council and the Canada Council would exist today.

In any event, I am very much concerned that this bill, rather than helping the problem, will only add to the administrative costs and diminish the sums of money that may be available to carry out the purposes for which the councils are being created.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hicks: At the same time, this bill reduces the Defence Research Board to the status of an advisory council to the minister. I am not entirely happy that research relating to the national defence of this country in the difficult times in which we live today should be handled in that manner, but I hope that the ministers of national defence will be enlightened enough to supply sums of money in their budgets to support appropriate levels of national defence research. It was originally said when this bill was being talked about that the Defence Research Board activities would be taken over by the other granting agencies—the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council—and, presumably, such aspects of the Canada Council or the new Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council that relate to them. I was very skeptical that this would work, because there is such an attitude prevalent among many academics in our country today that they tend to want to refuse research activities that are in any way classified or secret. Of course, we have certain types of academics who are suspicious of national defence activities whatever they may be. I have no sympathy for these people and I think that a country the size of Canada and in Canada's position in the modern world has to spend some money and some effort in defence research if we are to play our part among the NATO nations and among the powers of the world.

Penultimately, I want to say something about the Inter-Council Co-ordinating Committee. First of all, I am glad to say that this committee is not established by legislation. But the Honourable Senator Carter, in moving second reading of the bill, said that the minister did intend to create an Inter-Council Co-ordinating Committee which would be chaired by the secretary of his Department of State and would be comprised of the heads or presidents of the several councils concerned. These are all bureaucrats, and the only representation at all from the scientific or cultural community would, to quote Senator Carter's speech, be "from time to time."

I am suspicious indeed of the activities of this Inter-Council Co-Ordinating Committee. I am afraid that rather than being a co-ordinating committee it will be a committee which will place limitations on the activities of each of the councils which come under it and will subject them to further bureaucratic delays and make them comply with further red tape before legitimate scholars and scientists can get support for their work in Canada's universities and outside Canada's universities in the years ahead.

Finally, I want to close my remarks by referring to a view stated on more than one occasion recently by the present Secretary of State, to the effect that the federal government should only support research in the universities or elsewhere that is useful or practical or mission-oriented. No room for basic research in the universities or curiosity-oriented research! Well, I agree that the university people as well as others in the community must be willing to undertake practical research projects and must concern themselves with solving the problems of Canada and its provinces and its industries and its activities in our country today. But to say that you can do this best by eliminating the support of basic research is very, very wrong indeed.

Is it a brave or is it a foolhardy minister who so lightly ignores the proven wisdom of men like Doctors Tory, MacKenzie and Steacie? We can only hope, honourable senators, that the views of this Secretary of State will not prevail.

● (2050)

As I say, this bill can only improve the state of scientific research and the support of research both inside and outside the universities of this country in the years ahead if more funds are made available to do the job. If the same pie is divided into more pieces, then almost certainly the pieces will be smaller, the administrative costs will rise, and the effect of this legislation will not achieve any of the aims and objectives that its sponsors have advocated.

Senator Norrie: I should like to ask the honourable senator two questions. On several occasions during his speech he referred to research students in universities and elsewhere in the country. I should like to know how the students are divided, and in which place do they receive the better training—inside or outside our universities? Also, how much money is spent in the universities as compared with the amount spent outside?

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, in reply to Senator Norrie, I used the term inside and outside the universities because I was conscious of the work that the National Research Council has recently done to try to promote industrial research. I was referring to that. I was also trying to include generally the activities of the Canada Council, which, of course, are not restricted to the universities. Almost all those people, except those in the performing and fine arts, would have had university education and would have commenced their research careers in the university environment, although they may now be helped to carry them on in other milieus such as industry, agriculture or whatever it may be.

As for my giving the honourable senator a breakdown of the amount of money spent this way, I regret that I do not carry those figures in my head.

Senator Norrie: Not approximately?

Senator Hicks: Not approximately. Most of the kind to which I believe Senator Norrie refers, and to which I referred, would be university directed—except for those aspects of the Canada Council which are not primarily university oriented.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved the second reading of Bill C-12, to implement conventions between Canada and Morocco, Canada and Pakistan, Canada and Singapore, Canada and the Philippines, Canada and the Dominican Republic and Canada and Switzerland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill, as its title indicates, is to implement conventions between Canada and Morocco, Canada and Pakistan, Canada and Singapore, Canada and the Philippines, Canada and the Dominican Republic and Canada and Switzerland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

In addition, in order to facilitate changes in the tax treaties required by changes in the tax legislation of Canada or the other country concerned, the bill provides that the Governor in Council may, subject to a resolution of Parliament, give effect by order in council to any supplementary conventions.

When Bill C-12 was introduced in the Commons last fall, it included an agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany as well as the six conventions with the countries to which I have referred.

The Minister of Finance indicated in the other place that changes in the corporate tax legislation of the Federal Republic of Germany made it necessary to renegotiate the signed agreement with that country, particularly with respect to the articles relating to the taxation of dividends.

This does not mean that we have no relief from double taxation with the Federal Republic of Germany in the meantime, because there is a treaty dating from the 1950s, made prior to our tax changes of 1971, which gives tax relief in respect to most forms of tax, but not capital gains tax, which was introduced in Canada in 1971. So this treaty will have to be renegotiated, and hence the references to the Federal Republic of Germany have been removed from Bill C-12.

The expansion of Canada's network of tax treaties with other countries was implicit in the 1971 tax reform. At the present time Canada has 18 treaties in force, and most of them are being revised from day to day.

It is expected that new treaties will be signed with as many as 40 other countries. Tax treaties are particularly important, of course, because they present an opportunity to overcome or mitigate tax obstacles impeding the flow of trade and investment with other countries.

The bill under study consists of seven parts and has six schedules. The first six parts are the implementing legislation, and the text of the treaties is contained in the six schedules.

Before I comment on the content of the treaties I should like to address myself to Part VII of the bill. Part VII, honourable senators, is designed to ensure that the tax treaties can be kept up to date as a result of changes in bilateral tax relations between Canada and those countries.

Some honourable senators will recall that when Bill S-32, a bill implementing similar tax treaties with France, Belgium and Israel, was before us in the spring of 1976, some of the debate was devoted in this house and elsewhere to the proper mechanism under which a treaty could be amended. The mechanisms provided for in this bill are similar to those agreed to previously and in connection with Bill S-32 of 1976.

The six tax treaties under review follow the general pattern of the recent treaties previously concluded with other countries, such as that, for example, with France. They follow the format and language of the model draft convention prepared by the Committee of Fiscal Affairs of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, OECD. Canada is a member of this organization and accepts the language and style of the provisions recommended in the model convention. However, in a number of cases the substance of the OECD proposals does not reflect Canadian policies and cannot be followed in our bilateral treaties.

The most important of the Canadian departures from the OECD model, which concern dividends, interest and royalties, were discussed when the last of the bills to implement Canada's tax treaties, Bill S-32, was before us. The treaties generally provide that dividends can be taxed in the country of source at a maximum rate of 15 per cent, although higher rates are provided for under specific circumstances in the case of Pakistan and the Philippines, and a general rate of 18 per cent is provided for in the case of the Dominican Republic.

A general rate of 15 per cent—again, 18 per cent in the case of the Dominican Republic and 25 per cent for interest arising in Pakistan—is also provided for in the case of interest originating in one country and paid to a resident of the other country, although there are specific exemptions for certain types of interest in order to favour the development of close financial economic and trade relations between Canada and those countries.

With respect to royalties, the conventions with Morocco and Switzerland provide for a general rate of 10 per cent, and the ones with Pakistan and Singapore for a rate of 15 per cent. In the case of the Philippines, the Canadian rate is limited to 10 per cent and the rate in the Philippines to 25 per cent, or the lowest rate imposed by the Philippines on similar payments to residents of a third state, and in the case of the Dominican Republic the rate is limited to 18 per cent. There are a number of other matters dealt with in these tax treaties upon which I should like to comment briefly.

Capital gains: The provisions of the six treaties relating to capital gains reflect the standard Canadian position enabling the source country to tax gains arising on the sale of real property, business assets and shares in real estate companies.

Non-discrimination: Under the treaties, discrimination on the basis of nationality is prohibited, thereby ensuring Canadian nationals of fair and equal treatment in the six countries concerned. On the other hand, various fiscal incentives—such as the small business deduction and the dividend tax credit—which apply only to residents of Canada will not be extended to non-residents.

Teachers: Under most of Canada's existing tax treaties, teachers from abroad are given a two-year tax exemption in Canada. These provisions have given rise to widespread dissatisfaction, and the white paper on tax reform indicated that such concessions would be removed from new Canadian tax treaties. The tax treaties under review do not contain such provisions, I am glad to say. I do not know whether honourable senators realize what a temptation this has sometimes created for university administrators. Under the existing law—and this still obtains in relation to the United States because we have not renegotiated our tax treaty with them—if you wanted to pay a professor a net income of $20,000 you could bring someone in from the United States, pay him $20,000 a year for two years, and he would pay no taxes at all on that amount of money. On the other hand, if you were to engage a Canadian professor and you wanted him to have a net income of $20,000, you would have to pay him $27,000 or $28,000, depending on the nature of his dependents, which would determine the net amount of income available to him. This seemed very wrong, and indeed the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada called this to the attention of the federal authorities many years ago. I am glad that these treaties have avoided what seems to me to be this anomalous situation. I hope we will not be too long in renegotiating our treaties with the other countries, particularly the United States, with regard to which this effect still sometimes is felt among Canada's universities.

Senator Rowe: Before the honourable senator proceeds, I wonder if he would know offhand what the rationale was behind this decision that a two-year exemption be granted to teachers from abroad?

Senator Hicks: I think the original rationale was that this would enable visiting professors to come in for a limited period of time, and make it possible for academics to be more mobile as between one country and another.

Senator Rowe: Did it also include teachers?

Senator Hicks: It included teachers, though it was largely used, and on some occasions, I suggest, abused, in the universities.

Pensions and annuities: Canada has retained the general right to tax pensions and annuity payments to non-residents.

Double taxation relief: The provisions dealing with the specific methods for eliminating double taxation are, of course, among the most important in treaties such as those we are considering here. The Income Tax Act contains unilateral rules designed to alleviate double taxation of foreign source income of Canadian residents. These foreign tax credit rules are generally satisfactory, but because of their unilateral nature they cannot take into account all the particular circumstances of each case. A double taxation treaty gives Canada the opportunity to adjust its foreign tax credit rules to accommodate specific problems which may exist for Canadian taxpayers deriving income from a particular country. In addition, Canadian companies are granted an exemption in respect of certain dividends which they receive from their foreign affiliates in a country with which a double taxation convention exists. In order to promote the flow of capital and investment, the tax treaties also ensure that proper relief will be granted in Morocco, Pakistan, Singapore, the Philippines, the Dominican Republic and Switzerland in respect of taxes paid in Canada.

The tax treaties with Morocco, Pakistan, Singapore, the Philippines and the Dominican Republic contain an additional feature commonly referred to as a "tax-sparing provision." This is a technical means of ensuring that the tax incentives granted by those countries under pioneer-industry legislation will in fact benefit Canadian enterprises and/or individuals, as the case may be, and will not be taxed away in Canada. This is achieved by Canada agreeing to take into account, for the purposes of computing the foreign tax credit, the amount of tax which would have been payable in the absence of the special incentive legislation.

Honourable senators, I can see that my explanation is now beginning to sound like a section from the Income Tax Act.

On balance, the terms of the tax treaties provide an equitable solution, and in many respects a solution favourable to Canada, to the various problems of double taxation existing between Canada and these countries. I therefore commend this bill to the favourable consideration of this house.

Senator Inman: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Has he any idea of the dollar value, annually, of the dividends and interest received by Canadian citizens from Pakistan?

Senator Hicks: No, honourable senator, I cannot give you that figure. I shall try to get it for you. I should think it must be relatively small.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

JUDGES ACT AND OTHER ACTS IN RESPECT OF JUDICIAL MATTERS

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 7, the debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for second reading of Bill C-50, to amend the Judges Act and other acts in respect of judicial matters.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, when I adjourned this debate last week I did so after listening to Senator Flynn, which was one day after Senator McIlraith had introduced the bill on second reading. Unfortunately, I was absent the night before and did not have the advantage of hearing Senator McIlraith's remarks, but I did gather from what Senator Flynn was saying that it was possible that certain very fundamental and substantive matters are being dealt with in this bill by means of what looked like routine procedural changes. That, on my part, was only a suspicion when I was listening to Senator Flynn, and I adjourned the debate in order to give myself the opportunity to read Senator McIlraith's remarks and look over the legislation itself. Having had that opportunity, I was able to confirm in my own mind that this was indeed the fact, and that there were substantive changes involved in this legislation. I should like to deal with those tonight, though only very briefly.

I should say at the outset that my review of the bill itself, and of the debates both here and in the other place, does not lead me to disagree with its substantive provisions; however, I should like to comment on their adequacy in present day circumstances, and perhaps also on the direction of these changes and the methodology adopted in order to bring them into effect.

As Senator McIlraith stated, the most important aspect of the bill deals with the question of the independence of our judiciary. He pointed out that the increasing complexity of legislation over the past years, and the increasing involvement of the government in matters heretofore regarded as outside its area of involvement, has resulted in the Crown's becoming a major litigant before the courts. As a result, we have what Senator McIlraith referred to as "an anomaly." The anomaly would be, of course, the fact of having the main litigant represented by the Minister of Justice combined with the Attorney General in one office, one man, and one department. In that dual role he is appearing before the courts, presumably to have a wholly independent and impartial judgment rendered by the judge, while at the same time he has the administrative responsibility for the judiciary. I am afraid that rather than calling it "an anomaly," I would refer to it as a substantial conflict of interest.

Honourable senators will recall that in March last, speaking in the debate on the report of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, I voiced my concern over the fact that the functions of the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General are combined in one minister and in one department. My concern, of course, was, as it is now, based on the very same anomaly that Senator McIlraith has referred to. I must confess that I cannot, by any stretch of my imagination and as much as I might like to, link what I said in the chamber on March 16 last with the somewhat ameliorating provisions contained in this bill, which was read for the first time one month later on April 19. By itself, I must say that is far too short a lead time, but I confess that I am pleased that there is someone somewhere in the Department of Justice or on the other side who is aware of a problem. I am not sure whether that person or persons unknown are aware of the extent of that problem, but I am pleased to know that someone is aware of it.

Honourable senators have been told that what the bill proposes to do in this regard is to remove from the Department of Justice its responsibility for the administration of the affairs of courts and judges except those of the Supreme Court of Canada, and to vest that responsibility in a newly created post called the Commissioner of Federal Judicial Affairs. This new position will carry with it the status of deputy minister. But note, his appointment will be made by the Minister of Justice, and after consultation with the Canadian Judicial Council.

As to the administrative affairs of the Supreme Court of Canada, these will be transferred from the minister to the registrar of that court. But the registrar of that court will remain responsible to the Minister of Justice although, at the same time, be under the supervision of the Chief Justice of Canada as regards the day-to-day administrative matters of the court.

Honourable senators, we can take satisfaction from this move inasmuch as it represents a formal acknowledgment of the problem. Nevertheless, in my humble opinion, it is only a gesture in view of the basic nature of the conflict of interest danger, and this is particularly so because the new commissioner and the registrar will be directly responsible to the Minister of Justice for the most important matters they have to deal with. Even then, I would not be too concerned about the adequacy of the proposed arrangement, except for the fact that the Minister of Justice is, in fact, still the Attorney General of Canada, and in that role of Attorney General he is still the main litigant before the courts of this country. Therefore, I must conclude that the conflict of interest problem remains basically intact, although somewhat masked. It is one small stage removed from direct involvement at ministerial level.

I would not oppose the bill because of the inadequacies of this provision as I perceive them, but I would suggest and urge that the only real and permanent solution is to separate the functions of the Minister of Justice from those of the Attorney General—that is, place them under different ministers of the crown. This would re-establish the historic and independent roles of both officers and secure as firmly as can be secured the independence of the judiciary, and, flowing from that, the rule of law.

On the remainder of the provisions of this bill, I will only comment briefly. The bill provides for a substantial increase in the number of judges in Canada. In my opinion, the need is self-evident, and I commend the move. Nevertheless, let us urge the government to consider the judicial load created by each new piece of legislation—and I should say "governments" rather than "government" because this applies equally to the government of each province. The Chief Justice of Ontario has been deploring the amount of "unnecessary" legislation that is being produced today, and the problems and workload it creates for the judicial system. Therefore, let us, as legislators, also deplore it, and freely comment as to whether any legislation be necessary or unnecessary, notwithstanding what may be the judgment of cabinet in that regard. In so doing, we may help relieve the increasing pressures on our judicial system.

Let us also applaud the efforts of the Law Reform Commission and the Canadian Judicial Council to promote efficiency in the courts through the introduction of management techniques, pre-trial procedures and other time-saving and efficiency-making schemes. These present the real opportunities, in my opinion, to reduce the requirement for an ever-increasing number of judges.

May I refer briefly to two other matters raised by the bill? First, I would like to mention the question of judges' salaries, which are dealt with in this legislation. I really wish that the question of judges' salaries did not have to come before Parliament. I find it a repetitively awkward matter to deal with, and I wish it could be dealt with in a more objective atmosphere outside of the legislative process. However, I also realize that this problem will be with us for a long time, if not for all time, because of the constitutional legal background.

Ten years ago the remuneration of our judges was such that there was a real danger that the recruitment of men of high calibre from the bar might be prejudiced. This was particularly so in high case-load areas such as Toronto. However, over that period of time and up until today, substantial improvements have been made in the remuneration of our judiciary. On the one hand, there have been increases of 65 per cent, over roughly a 10-year period, in the case of the top level of our judiciary, and, on the other hand, increases of up to 140 per cent at the lower court levels. Accordingly, the danger that existed of our being unable to recruit our best minds into the legal system has greatly diminished.

Salary levels have now reached a point that, combined with the prestige and tenure of office afforded, a judicial appointment today can attract the best minds at the bar in any province, and these men are not only available today in the present climate, but oftentimes are actively seeking office. That, to me, is a great improvement, and I think we should recognize that from a lag position the judiciary is now in a caught-up position. Perhaps the consideration of further increases should be regarded in that light, and divorced from the cliché that we must continually increase the salaries to attract our best minds. In weighing the equation between the quality of candidates available for the bench and the public purse, the departmental officials now may bear in mind the law of diminishing returns which our graduated income tax system imposes. That diminution applies not only to the earnings of the bench but also to the earnings of the bar.

In support of my statement that good men are now available for recruitment into the judicial system, I need go no further than to say—and I think I can say it without any equivocation or fear of contradiction—that in Canada today we probably have as fine a bench as we have ever had in our history. I know that to be the case in the province of Ontario, and I am certain that that is so throughout Canada. For that I think we must give much credit to the present Minister of Justice, and also to his predecessors in office. If I read Hansard of the other place correctly, and the comments in this house, I think that observation can be considered a non-partisan one.

Finally, honourable senators, I should like to say something about the provisions of this bill that affect the Canadian Judicial Council. I need not remind you that this council was set up in 1971, as Senator McIlraith outlined, to promote uniformity, efficiency and improvement in the quality of our judicial services; but, most importantly, it was also charged with the establishment of inquiries into the conduct of judges.

The council consists of 24 chief justices of the superior courts, but on that council there are now no county court judges. If my recollection is correct, the powers of the Judicial Council and the Minister of Justice under the Judges Act differ as regards superior court judges and county court judges. This, I believe, is because of the constitutional background. Whereas on an adverse finding by the Judicial Council the Minister of Justice, through an order in council, can terminate the salary of a superior court judge, on such a finding with respect to a county court judge he can, by the same means, remove that judge from office. Although this may look like a distinction without a difference, the superior court judge can still hold his office, if not his salary, subject to the will of Parliament. On the other hand, both the office and the salary of a county court judge are entirely in the hands of the Judicial Council, the minister and the cabinet, and Parliament has no say except to debate a report ex post facto.

Honourable senators, if peer judgment is any part of the principles involved here, it is manifestly unfair that the Judicial Council contains no representative from the county court system. The amendment in this bill is designed to remedy this defect, and I commend it. It does so by the creation of the County Court Committee of the Judicial Council. I only leave it with honourable senators that this County Court Committee, when constituted under clause 16 of the bill, is to be "advisory." I pose the question: Is that adequate representation under the circumstances, particularly in a case involving the conduct of a county court judge? I cannot answer that.

Specifically, clause 16 is stated to be a step to bring about a closer working relationship between judges of the superior courts and judges of the county and district courts. I hope it may accomplish that purpose. However, is it perhaps not the time now to examine the possibility of merging the county and district courts throughout Canada? There is no distinction today in Quebec and Prince Edward Island. Over the years the jurisdictional distinctions between the two courts have all but disappeared, and today many county courts judges shoulder all the responsibilities and workload of many superior court judges, but at a lesser pay scale and at a lower point in the judicial pecking order. I ask honourable senators if, under the circumstances, this is fair or rational? Certainly today in Ontario the historic geographic basis for the two-court system, based on considerations of travel time, isolation, local interests, and social conditions and concerns, has all but completely disappeared. Managerial efficiency in handling case-loads, uniformity in practice and procedures, and even the continuing education of the judiciary in a complex legal environment, all seem to dictate the desirability of merging the two court systems. This is certainly so in Ontario, and I suspect it is also true in the other provinces in which merger has not yet been realized. Also, as a peripheral benefit, we would not have to be fiddling around over the question of representation on the judicial council by county court judges as provided for in clause 16 of the bill.

● (2130)

Honourable senators, I hope these remarks have made some contribution to this debate. This is a bill which I support in principle, and I must say that I support it without reservation, because of the directions in which it is moving the system. However, as you may suspect, although I support the bill without reservation, I do so with some comments, and some questions such as I have posed this evening.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): May I ask the honourable senator a question relating to the conflict of interest problem that he sees as a result of the fact that the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Canada are one and the same person?

The function related to the administration of the courts and the appointment of the members of the judiciary is performed as Minister of Justice. The representative function in the courts on behalf of the Crown is undertaken as only one function of the Attorney General. I understand that in the United Kingdom the head of the judiciary is the Lord Chancellor of the day. I gather—although on this point I am not sure—that the administration of justice is supervised through his office, and I believe that the appointment of the superior court judges of the United Kingdom are made by him. I am wondering how the United Kingdom authorities avoid the conflict of interest which the honourable senator seems to indicate obtains here.

Perhaps this is a question for the committee, and the house would prefer to have it answered there, but the honourable senator may have some observations to make on the subject.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I am not sufficiently familiar with the practice in the United Kingdom, but the Lord Chancellor, according to my understanding, has no function as Attorney General or Crown litigant. Therefore, the division of those two activities is complete. I cannot imagine that we could transpose the English experience into our system, their House of Lords, in fact, being the final court of appeal. However, I do believe we could segregate those two positions, with their potential for conflict, by simply dividing the two offices and putting them back into the historic role which prevailed in Canada earlier. I cannot remember on what date this merger came about, but I know that in Ontario at one time there was a segregation of these functions and, subsequently they became merged. I do not see any rationale for their being merged in one department, nor do I see in the English system any of the potential conflict of interest we find here.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I wonder if there is a situation in the United Kingdom which could help to solve the problem raised by the honourable senator?

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators—

Senator Lang: I would refer a difficult question such as that to a more erudite authority than I on the opposite side of the chamber.

Senator Forsey: I must disclaim any such title, but I meant to ask a supplementary question. Is it not perfectly clear that in the United Kingdom the office of Attorney General is completely distinct from any other office? That is the answer to the question put by Senator Connolly. I was a little surprised that he even asked the question, when I thought that the answer was so extremely obvious. As far as I know, the office of the Attorney General has always—well, I should not say always, but for a great many years it has been perfectly distinct from any other office.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): That is the answer to the question.

Hon. George McIlraith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator McIlraith speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, my remarks will be very brief.

Senator Asselin: That's surprising.

Senator McIlraith: I am not so sure it is surprising, but in any event my remarks will be brief.

I wish to thank Senator Flynn for his contribution to the debate. He raised two points of which I might make mention. He said that the bill provided for five additional puisne judges of the superior court in Quebec, and he asked whether the Government of Quebec had passed complementary legislation in this respect. The answer is that there is complementary legislation with relation to three of the new appointments to that court, and the Attorney General has indicated that the complementary legislation will come forward very shortly with respect to the remaining two appointments. In other words, it is in the mill, if I may use a phrase we so frequently use around here. All appointments of additional judges are, of course, made at the request of the respective attorneys general of the provinces concerned.

● (2140)

The other point he raised was one in which he differed slightly from my suggestion regarding the importance of the principle involved in the matter of the setting up of the Judicial Council and the additional powers for the registrar of the court. I think that question can be answered by itself. I have re-read my own remarks—something I rarely do—and I have re-read my honourable friend's remarks, after having listened to them rather attentively, as a result of which I stick to what I said originally concerning the important principle involved in this attempt to further protect the independence of the judiciary and the Federal Court itself. The remarks perhaps stand on their merit on that point.

I consider Senator Lang's speech this evening to be a most interesting and thoroughly exhaustive analysis of the matters raised in the bill itself and, indeed, some related matters. I am very appreciative of the exhaustive analysis he made of the whole subject.

There is one point arising out of his remarks that I think should receive some attention, that being the additional authority to be given to the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada under the bill. That additional authority will be in relation to administrative matters affecting the Supreme Court of Canada, which were formerly the responsibility of the Minister of Justice. That point is more important, perhaps, than Senator Lang's remarks indicated. The powers of the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada derive mainly from the Supreme Court Act, and under that act he comes directly under the responsibility of the Chief Justice in administrative matters. There are some special provisions respecting the printing of reports, and so forth, as well. To that extent, his powers are different from those of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs, who deals with the area of administrative responsibility for the rest of the federally appointed judiciary and the Federal Court. This distinction should be examined more fully in committee, because it will be seen that, except as to responsibility for the procurement of funds, the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada comes under the administrative responsibility of the Chief Justice of Canada, and not under the responsibility of the minister.

I am not aware of the desirability of any method of providing funds from the taxpayers' pockets other than through the responsible minister answerable to the electorate. It is interesting that in the course of this debate that point was not raised. I see no other way than by having both the registrar and the commissioner responsible to a minister for the procurement of funds and budgetary matters. It seems to me there is no other desirable way of achieving that under our system. The point raised by Senator Lang as to the desirability of separating that function from the function of the main pleader before the court is a most interesting one, and it deserves further examination at a future time and possibly further legislative action.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Goldenberg for the second reading of Bill C-25, to extend the present laws in Canada that proscribe discrimination and that protect the privacy of individuals.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I was sorry last night to appear to be impeding the Honourable Senator Goldenberg in his wish to conclude the debate on second reading, but there are certain features of this legislation which are of such importance that I felt I should draw the attention of the house to them, and indicate certain particular features to which I hope the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will give very close attention.

● (2010)

To begin with, I may say—I perhaps need hardly say—that I am in hearty accord with the general thrust of the first three parts of the bill, though I think there are difficulties and weaknesses there which need to be dealt with, and I shall say something briefly about a number of those. Part IV, I think, is a blot on the legislation. It is so riddled with exclusions, exceptions, and—I have forgotten the other word I wanted to use there; however, that will do—exclusions and exceptions and booby traps, deletions, somebody suggests; no, I don't think deletions, but booby traps—that unless the part can be thoroughly cleaned, purged, reformed, I think it would be better dropped from the bill altogether.

I might also add, it confers an extraordinary breadth of discretion upon a particular minister or upon the Governor in Council, and this is something I think needs very, very careful attention. I am perhaps hypersensitive on this sort of thing because of my experience in the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. From my long experience there—long and sad; a torturing experience, I might almost say—I have come to the conclusion that all such provisions should be examined with the greatest care and, indeed, with the greatest suspicion.

I want to draw the attention of the house to certain things which I particularly hope the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will give special attention to. I should like to draw attention, for example, first of all, to clause 22(1)(f), which deals with regulations. Unfortunately, it is by no means clear exactly what a regulation would be under this paragraph of clause 22(1). It might be, for example, a regulation as defined by the Interpretation Act, which is one thing; it might be any document called or referred to as a regulation in any statute, which is not necessarily the same thing at all; and it might, in the third place, be a regulation as defined in the Statutory Instruments Act, which is narrower than either of the other two.

I think we need to be given some idea of exactly what "regulation" is intended to mean in this clause. It seems to me that the term is used in a sense which is open to a variety of interpretations and might, therefore, lead to a number of difficulties.

In the second place, I want to draw attention to the use of the word "guideline" in clause 22(2). This is a new word, a relatively new word. I do not know whether it is one of the poisonous things we have borrowed from the Americans, or what it is, but I cannot see, for the life of me, why we should not simply have the word "regulation" or the words "statutory instrument," or something of that sort instead of this vague term "guideline." These things will be pieces of subordinate legislation, no matter what they are called, and they might as well be called by a plain name instead of by this vague and fancy vogue, cant word "guideline".

Under clause 22(1), the guidelines, to use the word again, which apply to a particular case—for example, a decision about a single human being—are not to be published. Well, how are we going to ever find out about them, then? This is a question, I think, which might well be asked in the committee.

Under clause 22(3) you have an enormous breadth of delegation—delegation and sub-delegation. It states:

On the recommendation of the Commission, the Governor in Council may, by order, assign to persons or classes of persons specified in the order who are engaged in the performance of the duties and functions of the Department of Labour of the Government of Canada such of the duties and functions of the Commission in relation to discriminatory practices in employment outside the Public Service of Canada as are specified in the order.

The degree of subdelegation which is there provided for seems extraordinarily wide.

Clause 23 provides as follows:

The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Commission, may make regulations authorizing the Commission to exercise or perform such powers, duties and functions, in addition to those prescribed by this Act, as are necessary to carry out the provisions of Parts I, II and III.

Why "in addition to those prescribed by this Act"? This is a most comprehensive phrase, and I think it is the type of enabling power that should never appear in legislation. Why should the Commission have "powers, duties and functions" not prescribed in the act? Now, there may be some adequate answer to this, but I think the answer should certainly be sought from the officials when they appear before the committee. I am assuming, of course, that this legislation will go to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It is highly appropriate that it should, because by anybody's standards it is a complex bill; I don't think that even in his most incautious moments the Honourable Senator Laird would have described this as a simple bill. I venture to think that it is complex enough that it should certainly go to that committee.

Then we get clause 27(2)(f); we find there that:

Every member of the Commission and every person employed by the Commission shall take every reasonable precaution to avoid disclosing any matter the disclosure of which—

Now, here's the gem:

(f) might disclose legal opinions or advice—

Well, those words touch any member of the Statutory Instruments Committee on the raw. The clause continues:

—might disclose legal opinions or advice provided to a government department—

Well, that's quite bad enough. The clause continues:

—or body or privileged communications between lawyer and client in a matter of government business.

That last is the real beauty. What is "a matter of government business"? This ought to be made clear to us; and if there are "privileged communications between lawyer and client" and the client is willing to, and perhaps even anxious to, have them disclosed, why should they not be disclosed? It would appear that the last words seem to extend to legal advice given to a party adverse to the Crown, and why shouldn't he be able to have it divulged if he wants the opinion divulged?

If I may turn back for a moment to clause 19, we find there another beauty:

The Governor in Council may make regulations respecting the terms and conditions to be included in or applicable to any contract, licence or grant made or granted by Her Majesty in right of Canada providing for—

And so forth. Well, why "respecting"? Why not simply "prescribing"? But here, again, we come across one of those favourite words of the Department of Justice, "respecting"; and that confers in the opinion of the Department of Justice and the interpretation which it places upon the word power, "authority as plenary and as ample as the Imperial parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow." At least that is scarcely an exaggeration. It is interpreted to confer a power to cover nearly everything but the kitchen sink. Even when it is limited by such words as follow there, it is a very wide power, which ought to be scrutinized with great care.

Then there is clause 40(3)(c), which provides:

In relation to a hearing under this Part, a Tribunal may . . .

(c) receive and accept such evidence and other information, whether on oath or by affidavit or otherwise, as the Tribunal sees fit, whether or not such evidence of information is or would be admissible in a court of law.

● (2020)

I feel some doubt about that. I commend that to the notice of honourable senators who are lawyers, and particularly those who sit on the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, as something that ought to be examined rather carefully. I think there are parallels for it in other legislation—notably in some labour relations legislation. But in my judgment it needs to be examined with some diligence, because it might leave the party complained about simply at the mercy of the members of the tribunal.

I want to call attention finally to clause 54(g), which brings out our old friend “legal opinions” again—“legal opinions or advice.” It is the same kind of wording you get in clause 19, and once again the same objections apply or the same questions arise.

If we are to have a Part IV at all, then it seems to me that the scope of the discretion to provide for exemptions, exclusions and so forth should be very much narrowed. The regulations, or a large part of what regulations are contemplated, probably ought to appear in the bill itself. In any case we ought to be given some idea of what the regulations are likely to be. This business of giving enormous power to make regulations and saying, “Ah hah! Wait until you see them. No, you can’t see them now” is one, I think, of which the members of this chamber have complained more than once, and I think that some of the complaints at least have been justified.

I very much hope, therefore, that when this bill goes, as I assume it will, to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, it will get the kind of intensive scrutiny and the kind of zealous scrutiny—zealous for the protection of the ordinary citizen, zealous for the protection of the rights of both Houses of Parliament—which that committee is so well qualified to give.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to rise in general support of what Senator Forsey has so ably said. It seems to me that one of the things which I have observed in increasing intensity since I came here, and, in fact, long before I came here, is the tendency for the Houses of Parliament and legislatures to allow, by default almost, very large powers of regulation to be given to Governors in Council and to Lieutenant Governors in Council; not only the power to deal with administrative matters, which sometimes can be extremely important in themselves, but powers to deal with substantive law, to deal with policy, to deal with principles of legislation. It seems to me that on every opportunity which presents itself the Senate, at least, should make known its view that the power to deal with policy, the power to deal with principles in legislation, should remain in Parliament and not be vested in any body, even so august as the Governor in Council or, in a province, the Lieutenant Governor in Council. Consequently, without going into any detail, I support entirely what Senator Forsey said on this point.

I want to draw attention to another thing which I think is completely and utterly obnoxious. To me, it is a new manifestation of the views of the Department of Justice and the government, namely, that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown is confidential and that the members of the public are not to know what the law officers think of any law.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I cannot conceivably think of any greater prostitution of the powers and duties of the law officers of the Crown than this determination to keep secret from the public, who are the people most concerned with it all, what they think of what the government does. So on this point too, I support and emphasize what has been said by Senator Forsey.

There is another thing which I am surprised he did not note, and that is that there is a gross omission in clause 2 of the bill which defines its purpose. It says, or purports to say:

(a) every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have, consistent with his or her duties and obligations as a member of society—

Remember that sonorous phrase, that expression of the fine principles of democracy which we all think very highly of, and which almost equates itself with the great American Declaration of Independence. I repeat, it says:

—should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have, consistent with his or her duties and obligations as a member of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices—

So far who could say better? Ah, lest one’s elation should be raised too high by not reading the second print, or the fine print in declarations of this government, one goes on to see an enumeration of the bases on which discrimination is prohibited. One would have thought that such a splendid declaration of principle should not have limited itself to some particular kinds of discrimination, but should have been broad enough to deal with all kinds of discrimination. And one of the omissions I note, and which to me is most obvious, in those things which attempt to limit this splendid declaration, is the words “political belief”.

How many people in Canada since this government came to office have been discriminated against on the basis of their political belief? How many? Honourable senators, I dare anyone to stand here and say it is less than many, many thousands spread all across this grand country. People shall not be discriminated against, this fine clause says, for many things including a conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted, but it omits the phrase "political belief". So I can only conceive that in the views of the draftsmen of this legislation, and of the government which sponsors it, that they consider political belief which is not recognized as supporting the government to be worse than a situation where someone has been convicted of an offence but has been pardoned for it.

Senator Croll: Oh, no.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Well, what else can you believe in? What else can you believe in? My honourable friend, Senator Croll, who on many occasions has waxed eloquent upon the necessity of no discrimination for any reason, now smiles. Does he think that now the citizens of Canada should be discriminated against because they do not vote for this government? Does he? How many of them have been denied appointments to the Senate because of their political beliefs? I haven't.

Senator Hicks: The present government has appointed more members to this Senate who were not of its political persuasion than the rest of the governments of Canada since Confederation put together.

● (2030)

Senator Smith (Colchester): My honourable friend exposes himself to me, as he has done so many times in the past. He can count on the fingers of one hand all those who support his proposition in this house simply by their being here.

Senator Steuart: How many did Dief put in?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Well, he surely did not put in enough to offset the discrimination of the ages.

There are some honourable senators here, and I have heard them say it in this house, who believe that there should not be this kind of discrimination, but that this house should be restored to a reasonable balance of political faiths by doing away with this sort of discrimination. Where are they tonight? Are they here? Does Senator Denis think he can wave me away, or wave the discrimination away, by a toss of his hand? Perhaps he can, but time will tell perhaps a different story.

Senator Perrault: Don't get political, now.

Senator Smith (Colchester): At last I rouse the interest of the Leader of the Government. I do not know that that will do either of us any good, however.

But the sponsors of this bill say, "Let us do away with discrimination."

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Yet, when they come to a kind of discrimination that is as important as any other, and which has denied countless Canadians the opportunity to participate in the public life of this country at all levels, they sit back and smile, thinking that because they say that someone who has been convicted for an offence for which a pardon has been granted should not be discriminated against, they have done their duty. Well, honourable senators, aside from, and in addition to, supporting Senator Forsey, I suspect that he might very well feel that he overlooked something very important when he became a little tender about subjecting the Senate to too much of his wisdom at one time, and stopped before he reached this very important matter.

Senator van Roggen: Would the honourable senator permit a question? I had some difficulty in following his train of thought. Would the honourable senator feel that if a Jew were appointed to a government board, this would be discrimination against all Protestants? If the government appointed a black to a given government board, would this be discrimination against all whites? I have difficulty following the argument.

Senator Walker: It is a nonsensical question.

Senator Smith (Colchester): No, any more than I would feel that if they appointed a Tory they would be discriminatory.

Senator Steuart: It might be stupid, but it would not be discriminatory.

Senator Flynn: It has happened.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Goldenberg speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, my original intention was to say very little.

Senator Flynn: Stick to it.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Good intention.

Senator Goldenberg: I was going to suggest that the various criticisms that were raised be raised in committee. However, there has been a little excitement here this evening—

Senator Flynn: Won't you add to it?

Senator Perrault: There was more heat than light.

Senator Goldenberg: I do not intend to add to the excitement. I intend to explain one or two of the items in the list of prohibited acts.

Senator Yuzyk, whom I thank for his kind remarks about my speech the other day, said last night, and I quote him:

Certain grounds of discrimination, such as language, political affiliation, sexual orientation and physical handicap, generally and not only in employment matters, have been excluded from this legislation.

I hope honourable senators will bear with me if I make a few remarks on each of these items. It may save time in committee.

In general, I want to point out that the list of prohibited discriminatory grounds is the largest and the most comprehensive list of prohibitive grounds of discrimination in any anti-discrimination law in Canada or in the United States at the federal or state level.

The Human Rights Commission which is to be appointed under this legislation can expect that the administration of this list will place considerable demands on its time. This is especially so with respect, for example, to "conviction for which a pardon has been granted" and to "physical handicap in employment," as these are relatively novel grounds which will require development of principles and techniques without much guidance from other jurisdictions.

The commission will have other heavy demands on its time. For example, the item on the list about which the Leader of the Opposition enjoys hearing—I mean the development of the "equal pay for work of equal value" requirement.

Senator Flynn: I have always been in favour of that. I supported you in this respect.

Senator Goldenberg: The initial demands of organization, the preparation of guidelines and regulations, the development of enforcement techniques and the development of its educational and informational role, will impose heavy demands on the commission. Consequently it was felt that some limits should be placed on the grounds to be included so as not to create an impossible workload. Therefore, generally only those grounds which have been included in other jurisdictions, and about which some principles and precedents have been developed which the commission can draw on, have been included.

I wish to say a word on each of the matters mentioned by Senator Yuzyk. The honourable senator mentioned the matter of sexual orientation. This has not been included as a ground for any anti-discrimination legislation in any Canadian province or in the United States at either the federal or state level. Consequently the implications of including it are quite unexplored.

Its inclusion would raise security problems that apply to employment in certain sensitive areas of the public service. The security community warns, rightly or wrongly, that homosexuals are vulnerable to blackmail. Also, problems would be raised for External Affairs and other departments involved in rotational service in countries where homosexuality is illegal; and other problems are raised for the military and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in barrack situations and in situations where it would not be appropriate to have a homosexual supervisor.

It could be argued that sexual orientation should be dealt with in the context of security rather than anti-discrimination. The minister has announced that he intends to direct the Human Rights Commission to undertake a special study into the problem of whether sexual orientation should be included as a ground in the Human Rights Act, and report its findings to Parliament.

Another point raised by Senator Yuzyk, much more kindly than Senator Smith (Colchester), is the matter of—Senator Smith (Colchester): Discrimination against opponents of the government.

Senator Goldenberg: —political affiliation. Both Senator Yuzyk and Senator Smith (Colchester) spoke about the omission of political affiliation as a ground for discrimination. This also raises security problems when applied to employment in the public service. It would allow persons with extreme political beliefs to demand employment in sensitive areas.

● (2040)

Senator Flynn: How do you define "extreme political beliefs"?

Senator Croll: Being a Conservative.

Senator Goldenberg: While the government probably would be able to refuse such employment under the "bona fide occupational requirement" exception under clause 14(a), it is thought to be preferable to leave it out of the bill. If reliance has to be placed on clause 14(a), the commission and Human Rights Tribunals which are proposed under the legislation could be placed in the position of reviewing the government's security policy. However, they probably would not be given full information on which to proceed.

Senator Flynn: What else is new?

Senator Goldenberg: The situation created could be embarrassing for both the government and the commission.

Senator Flynn: You should never embarrass the government.

Senator Goldenberg: The Leader of the Opposition will have to admit that I am frank.

Senator Flynn: Yes, a bit too much for the liking of the Leader of the Government.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question which would further give him an opportunity to emphasize his frankness.

Senator Perrault: And fairness.

Senator Goldenberg: I am going to ask Senator Smith to reserve his question until I have concluded my remarks.

The next ground which has been omitted, and to which Senator Yuzyk made reference—I might add that I raised the same question in discussions on this bill before proposing second reading—is language. It is felt to be preferable to deal with all protection of official language rights at the federal level in the context of the official languages regime. To also include language rights for French and English in the Human Rights Act could only create confusion, as two separate government agencies would be involved under two separate schemes.

It is not thought to be appropriate to protect language rights for all minority groups in this bill. To do so would mean that the federally regulated service industries, and so on, would be required to provide service in any language demanded. This would be a problem in employment where a person did not speak the language of the workplace, although the "bona fide occupational requirement" exemption in the bill would provide some relief in this regard.

I would also point out, particularly to Senator Yuzyk, that some protection against discrimination on the basis of language is provided under the ground "national or ethnic origin." To the extent a person is discriminated against because he is identified as speaking a certain language, protection is provided.

Senator Yuzyk also spoke about the restriction of physical handicap in employment matters. Under clause 21(1)(h) a duty is placed on the commission to promote the improvement and development of arrangements for the physically handicapped in the areas of goods, services, facilities and accommodation. Including it as a ground would raise very difficult questions for the commission as to what constitutes "equal treatment" and what fairly can be required. No province prohibits discrimination in these areas, and thus their experience cannot be drawn upon. There would have to be several exceptions made to the prohibition. For example, the railways cannot be expected to conduct expensive and difficult renovations and have specially trained attendants available to aid the handicapped at every small station. It is expected that the route of persuasion and promotion adopted under clause 21(1)(h) could be just as effective as prohibiting discrimination on this ground, as greater co-operation can be expected from the providers of goods, services, facilities and accommodation.

Finally, Senator Yuzyk made reference to what he called a thorny issue, and it is that. Another exception in this bill is found in clause 63(2), which states:

Nothing in this Act affects any provision of the Indian Act or any provision made under or pursuant to that act.

The honourable senator went on to say, correctly:

There is outright discrimination in the Indian Act, on the basis of blood, against women. Indian women who marry white men lose their rights on the reserve, while white women marrying Indian men have their rights on the reserve.

This was recognized by the authors of the bill. The provisions of the Indian Act are exempted from Bill C-25 because of the government's commitment to the National Indian Brotherhood not to alter the Indian Act without prior consultation. This process of consultation, I am advised, is under way and proposals for a new Indian Act are being drawn up by a joint National Indian Brotherhood-Government Committee.

The prime problem is section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act, which allows for the disenfranchisement of an Indian woman who marries a non-Indian. There is no comparable provision for an Indian man. The Minister of Justice has served notice to the National Indian Brotherhood that the situation existing under section 12(1)(b) is not acceptable to the government and a solution will have to be reached. However, it is not felt possible to break the commitment at this point in time.

The general provisions of the bill, of course, do apply to Indians; that is, where an Indian is discriminated against in employment or in the provision of goods, and so on, the bill generally does apply and will provide a remedy. It is only where a specific term of the Indian Act is involved—the one to which I made reference—that the bill does not apply.

As far as my very good and very old friend Senator Forsey is concerned, I shall not undertake to reply to the many points that he raised. I agree with him that those are matters that should more properly be considered in committee.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if the honourable senator, having concluded his remarks, would now be prepared to accept a question or two, which will give him an opportunity to display his frankness in relation to these matters.

Senator Goldenberg: I thought it was one question before. It is one or two now, is it? I will allow two questions.

Senator Smith (Colchester): If the honourable senator is afraid of two I will be glad to reduce it to one.

Senator Goldenberg: I will accept two questions.

Senator Smith (Colchester): The first one is this: Does he really think it would be against the public interest to embarrass the government by inquiring into its security practices, and its advantages and disadvantages?

Senator Goldenberg: I do not think anyone can give a simple answer to that question. It all depends on how you define "security practices" and what is involved. I cannot say any more on that.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the honourable senator for his comment, although I cannot thank him for an answer. My second question is: Does he think it is worse to be an opponent of the government than to have committed a criminal offence for which a pardon has been granted?

Senator Goldenberg: I am sorry, I did not hear the first part of the question.

Senator Flynn: Senator Hicks is prepared to reply, though.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I will be glad to repeat it and let Senator Hicks answer if he will. My question was whether the honourable senator thinks it is worse to be an opponent of the government than to have committed a criminal offence for which a pardon has been granted.

Senator Croll: If you happen to be a Tory it is.

Senator Goldenberg: I am going to leave that to the imagination of Senator Smith. He has a wonderful imagination, judging from the remarks he made tonight.

Senator Perrault: Fantasy, that is what it is.

Senator Smith (Colchester): With all respect to the honourable senator, I think he would have done better to have let Senator Hicks answer it.

● (2050)

Senator Flynn: I am not too sure about that.

Senator Yuzyk: May I ask a question with regard to the committee meeting? Can we look forward to having the Minister of Justice appear before the committee when we are discussing this bill?

Senator Goldenberg: I have already spoken to the Minister of Justice and told him, assuming we give second reading to the bill and refer it to the committee, we expect him to be a witness. He agreed he would be.

Senator Flynn: A very flexible witness.

Senator Langlois: And a very good one, too.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Goldenberg moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION (SCIENTIFIC ACTIVITIES) BILL 1976

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday, the debate on the motion of Senator Carter for second reading of Bill C-26, respecting the organization of certain scientific activities of the Government of Canada.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Carter gave us a very complete explanation of this bill and its contents. It is not my intention to go through it item by item, except insofar as it may be necessary to explain some of its provisions as background for some comments I may make.

As Senator Carter said, the bill does not attempt to cover the whole field of science policy. In spite of that fact, the discussions that have taken place in the science community and in the other place have ranged far and wide over the whole problem of science policy in which our own committee, the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy, has been engaged for a number of years, and on which it has concluded its hearings and is about to bring in a report.

The title of the bill is "An Act respecting the organization of certain scientific activities of the Government of Canada." The short title is the "Government Organization (Scientific Activities) Act, 1976." I am sure that honourable senators will agree with me that we can at least endorse the principle if it means that the government is at last going to organize its activities in any sphere of the national interest, including science policy. The evidence over the years has been that it has not been very successful in organizing its activities in respect to the economy, of which science policy is a part.

The bill deals largely with the university sector, which is one of the three main granting sectors in receipt of funding from the federal government through various organizations set up for that purpose. The other two are the government in-house establishment and industry.

The background of this has been documented many times, particularly by our own committee. It is that we are in a most extraordinary position in respect to the balance of funding among all countries—including the entire group of free market countries and others—in that we have the largest percentage of our funding in-house. While this bill does not deal specifically with that, it is one of the major problems facing us, largely because the government has not succeeded, but has failed completely, to get the bureaucracy and the departments to pay any attention whatsoever to its own statements of intent and priority over the years. This raises the question of whether the intent expressed by the government in this bill will be implemented by action. I hope it will. I am sure all honourable senators hope it will. But, if the record of this government in stating fundamental scientific priorities and getting them implemented is any record, this bill might just as well be thrown out.

The fact of the matter is that three successive science ministers have stated categorically that it is a high priority of this government to transfer funding to industry. Yet, in spite of statements that were made three times by three different ministers, the percentage of government funding to industry has declined. This is the major problem. We have to ask ourselves, "Does the government mean to implement the provisions of this bill, or will we be faced with this same situation of utter ineptness in achieving what the government itself says are its priorities?"

The bill, as it stands, is based almost entirely on the report of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy. This has been indicated, particularly in the comments of the present minister, who has, at his own request, come before our committee and explained those recommendations in detail.

Madam Speaker, I would find it much easier if one of our rules were enforced. I find myself disturbed by a conversation that is going on. Perhaps you might call attention to the rule that suggests that a conversation such as this be carried on outside.

Senator Flynn: I suppose, if Senator Eudes, for once, has something to say, Senator Grosart might yield.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Senator Grosart: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am sorry for having to bring that to your attention, but the two honourable senators seemed to find it necessary to carry on their conversation in voices so loud as to disturb me.

Senator Langlois: Perhaps it was an echo of your own speech.

Senator Grosart: That could be, although it did not sound as though it was an echo of what I was saying. It sounded much more serious and important.

I was saying that the bill before us is based on the recommendations of the Senate committee. There are some exceptions, and the minister has come before us, at his own request, and explained those exceptions. I cannot say that the committee has accepted them. In some respects we find this a half-way measure, but it is at least half way with respect to the recommendations made by the Senate committee.

The discussion on this bill in the science community, which has been very extensive, and in the other place, has repeatedly mentioned the recommendations of our own committee. They have acknowledged the work that has been done by this committee and the influence of the report of that committee on this particular aspect of government science policy. Over and over again, the reference is to the "Lamontagne committee." I am sure honourable senators will understand if I take a moment or two to say that Senator Lamontagne's name has gone through the science community in Canada and around the world as one who has made a most significant contribution to science policy during the last few years.

● (2100)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: I might perhaps regret a bit—not very much—that the committee is always referred to as the Lamontagne committee, although I once said that I hoped it would always be referred to as such because of the dominant contribution made by Senator Lamontagne. Unfortunately, it is not always referred to as a committee of the Senate. However, I am sure that those who are particularly concerned with this field are aware that it was a committee of the Senate chaired by Senator Lamontagne.

Senator Langlois: Perhaps we should call it the Lamontagne-Grosart committee.

Senator Grosart: The deputy leader suggests it be called the Lamontagne-Grosart committee. Far from it. As a matter of fact, the deputy chairman was Senator Cameron, and he, too, carried much of the load. Unfortunately, he is not present this evening. The sponsor of this bill, Senator Carter, was one of those who made a very significant contribution, and there were others.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: It is a mistake to name names, but those are individuals who had either a special position on the committee or a specific role in the presentation of this bill.

It was a committee that worked well as a team under Senator Lamontagne. I am sure that all honourable senators who were part of that committee will agree that Senator Lamontagne did lead a team, and got some of us to do some work.

The bill before us, as Senator Carter said, is in nine parts, seven of which deal with certain changes that are to be made in the framework of the structure for the granting of federal funds to universities for research. On occasion in the discussion there is reference to a trio of councils. Actually, there are four involved—the Canada Council, the Science Council, the National Research Council, and the Medical Research Council. The latter is governed by an act called the Medical Research Board Act, but it is invariably referred to as the council. For these four councils there are additions and subtractions from their jurisdictions, their powers and their authorities. The Defence Research Board is to be abandoned. Canadian Patents and Development Limited is to be transferred from one department to another. These are inter-board or council transfers, and to them are added two new councils, which was a major recommendation of the Lamontagne committee. These are the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council.

The bill deals largely with granting functions. The total amount involved in terms of government expenditure for the last fiscal year was $160 million, whereas this year, according to the blue book, total council expenditures will amount to $172 million.

Naturally, the proposed changes have raised a good deal of discussion, comment, and in some cases, almost defiant rejection, particularly from those who will lose some power and authority—which is understandable—particularly the Canada Council, and from some very ardent supporters of the work of other councils, such as the National Research Council. A very good example of that was the speech made by Senator Hicks last night in which he drew attention to the record and the work of the NRC and regretted that some of its powers and authority in the granting field were being transferred.

The recipients of the grants, generally speaking, have been happy that they are getting the grants. What concerns them now is whether there will be any change in the receipt of grants. Most generally, however—and this is an interesting fact—all of the studies, with perhaps one exception, that have been made of this general proposal for the restructuring of the granting councils have been generally in favour. There have been some suggested amendments but, by and large, the report of the Senate committee has been endorsed.

In its first report, the Senate committee found that the situation in Canada was that we had science policy by accident. I am glad to say that there has been some improvement over the years, for which the committee, I think, can take some credit, and the bill attests to that. Some might say that this bill is just an ad hoc stab at the problem, but it is more than that. The minister has described it as being evolutionary, not revolutionary, and I think that is true. In its second report, the committee said the same thing—that there be an evolution of the granting function, not a revolution.

It would also be fair to say that this bill suggests an experiment. In this whole field of the administration of science policy it will always be an experiment, as I will indicate in a few moments in my comments on the NRC. In the broad discussion on science policy, of course, we heard about the utter failure of the government to use science policy in the general interests of Canada, the economy and the universities in these last few years. The results, it is not unfair to say, have been disastrous. Total funding by the government of scientific activities has steadily decreased year by year, to the point where it is now no more than 1 per cent of GNP, compared with figures such as over 2 per cent in The Netherlands, over 2 per cent in Germany, over 2 per cent, or thereabouts, in Japan, and so forth, in spite of the fact that the recommendation of our committee some five years ago was that by 1980 total funding should reach 2.5 per cent of GNP. The government has lagged in that respect, and to some extent it is understandable, given the problem of inflation and the need for restraint. I am not being entirely critical, but the restraints and constraints on the support of science have had disastrous results.

As to our performance in technological innovation as a country—a free market, industrial country—Canada, according to the OECD, is at the bottom of the list. And this is in a country where technological innovation could almost be described as the lifeblood of its exports. That is the situation we are in.

Some of the provisions of the proposed act raise a few questions which, I hope, will be discussed in committee, or elsewhere. In the first place, as Senator Carter said, the two new councils, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, are to be set up under separate acts. I do not know how that can be achieved. There may well be—there must be—some methodology to do that, but what we are dealing with here is a bill, which will presumably become an act, and the intention is to extract from it the provisions respecting two of these councils, and set them up under separate acts. Perhaps in due course it will be explained to us how that can be done. This, of course, is to match the situation for the Canada Council which is set up under an act, the Science Council which is under an act, the Medical Research Council, and so on.

The statement that they would be set up under separate acts is, I suppose, a kind of an apology for offering these provisions in an omnibus bill. Obviously, the proper way would have been to bring in separate legislation setting up these councils, but I will not comment too much on the reasons for that, except to say that it is part of the general legislative untidiness of the government to do things in this manner.

The usual remark from the Leader of the Government is, "Oh well, the opposition holds up these bills and it is terribly hard to get them through." The answer to that, of course, is that here we are, in the last three weeks, having to deal with 16 or more bills, when we have had only eight, I believe, in the whole session up to this time. Obviously, if the government wishes to manage its affairs, it can get these bills through, particularly when there is a suggestion of a June 30 deadline for recess. Surely we can have better management of our affairs than this, so that we do not have this type of omnibus bill, which we are then told will be broken down into separate acts. I do not know if they will be brought back to the House of Commons and the Senate. I do not know how we can pass an act by extracting it from an omnibus bill but perhaps there is a way, and, if so, I would be very interested in knowing about it.

The broad principles accepted by Senator Lamontagne's committee have been included in the provisions of this legislation. As I said, the bill goes at least halfway—perhaps more than halfway—because it accepts the major principle on which the committee laid its greatest emphasis; that is to say, the separation of the granting powers from other functions of these councils. It provides also for a co-ordinating council which will report to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. It will have a not too clearly defined function—as a matter of fact, it does not appear in the bill at all. The minister says he will appoint such a council. It will, according to his statement, not have any real authority; it will be able to advise the minister as to what is going on. It will, I suppose, to some extent co-ordinate the work of the councils, and the minister says it will have a major role in deciding on the allotment of funds from council to council.

In total, this seems to me to be a less effective method of tackling the problem than that suggested by the Senate committee. We suggested what I think would be a much more suitable and effective structure. In the first place, we suggested that these councils be known as foundations. I will not go into the reason, but there is an excellent reason and perhaps it was not understood by the minister, MOSST or the draftsmen. However, I am quite convinced that it would have been much better had these been set up as foundations.

This would apply particularly in the case of the Canada Council. Honourable senators may or may not be aware that the Canada Council was a creation of Senator Lamontagne when he was Secretary of State. At that time there was a large private legacy available to Canada. It occurred to Senator Lamontagne, and he was able to so persuade his colleagues, that this should be used as the base on which there could be set up a Canada Council to carry on certain activities, particularly in granting research funds in the field of the arts. At that time the social sciences and the humanities were included. The reason it was set up as a foundation was so that it could receive private funds and government funds, and dispense them. It was on the basis of that success story that we recommended that these be foundations rather than councils. There were other reasons, in addition to that.

Another problem that will arise from the implementation of the provisions of this bill is that these councils report to three different ministers. This, in my opinion, makes no sense whatsoever. The recommendation of the committee was that they would all report to one minister, the Secretary of State. I am sure that there will be very serious problems of non-coordination, which is one of the serious problems we face in science policy. The inter-council co-ordinating committee will report to the Minister of MOSST, so we will have a group of councils reporting to different ministers. Where they are to achieve the kind of co-ordination which is the principle of the bill from such a setup, I do not know.

This bill is divided into nine parts, and I now propose to deal specifically with them. The first deals with the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, and here there will be a transfer of the social sciences and humanities from the council to the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. This was a major recommendation of the Senate committee. One of the situations we discovered was the almost complete neglect of the social sciences in the whole field of support from the government and, indeed, from the private sector. We had suggested that this council be known as the life sciences foundation and we made some other recommendations, into which I do not intend to go now. One included the granting powers of the biological sciences. It is in this field that there has been most opposition to the Senate recommendation in the provisions of the bill. The Canada Council itself has put up a hard fight, and its supporters have done likewise. Senator Hicks, I believe, is one of those who regard it as not a good idea to split these functions. I have found that those who feel this way are in a rather small minority of the experts and those who have studied the question. Going back to the UNESCO studies, they recommend this type of separation, and the Science Council has made much the same recommendation.

The reason for this, or one of the reasons, at least, is the tremendous growth in the importance of the social sciences, which is a very, very different situation from 20 years ago when the Canada Council was established. The neglect of the social sciences over the years has been very marked. For example, when the Science Council itself was established, it did not include a single representative of the social sciences, yet this was to be the council that would advise the government in the whole field of scientific activity, research and development. As a matter of fact, this very bill now before us provides for an additional number of directors of the Science Council in order to provide specifically for representation from the social sciences. This principle of separating granting from other functions, which applies also to the National Research Council, with which I will deal shortly, is of very great significance. I will not go into all the reasons, but there is almost a consensus, but not quite, among those who have carefully studied this problem that the two should not be mixed.

In these cases, and particularly in the case of the NRC, the laboratory function is a thing apart, and it does not seem to make sense that a council which has the function of developing research laboratories should also be making grants. That is the main reason for the separation.

There has been some suggestion that the transfer to the granting powers from the National Research Council to the new Council on Natural Sciences and Engineering Research is in some way intended to downgrade the NRC. So far as I am concerned, that is not the intent I read into the bill. On the contrary, the record of the NRC could hardly be more outstanding. I have said myself that some of the problems of Canadian science policy are a direct result of the excellence of the NRC. There can be no question that in the whole field of its operations up to now it has achieved an international reputation which would be hard to match in any other scientific organization in the world. So I say there is no intention here to downgrade the NRC.

As a matter of fact, the provisions in this bill are part of the evolution of the NRC, which is sometimes forgotten. One of the great credits we can give to the NRC is that it has developed within its own mandate many organizations which are now standing on their own feet. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is one; the Defence Research Board is another; and the Medical Research Council is still another. So all that is happening here is that the NRC is being given credit for its ability to achieve this function of starting up other organizations and then sending them out to stand on their own feet. That is what is being done, for example, with Canadian Patents and Development Limited, a crown corporation whose main function is the patenting and marketing of scientific discoveries emanating from government. It does, however, have some mandate going beyond that.

So, here, two more of the original functions of the NRC are being transferred. I say that NRC can be proud that two more children are being added to its distinguished family. That should not in any way be regarded by NRC as a downgrading of its functions or its reputation. Quite the contrary. One would hope that its marvellous record of laboratory research will be enhanced by the concentration which will now be possible on that most important function, and one or two others which have been added in the bill, such as scientific information and assessment.

I come now to Part IV of the bill. The structure of the Science Council was of some concern to Senator Lamontagne's committee. Some recommendations were made particularly with respect to the fact that whereas it was an advisory council on a medium and long-term basis to the government, it had public servants or bureaucrats on the board, and the committee decided that that did not make sense. So the bill provides that there will be no more civil servants on the board.

We found that here was this tremendously important committee, whose chairman was not full-time and was not paid. We recommended that he should be paid, but there seems to be some question in the bill because it does not definitely provide that the chairman, the president, will be paid. It does not say he will not be paid, either; it says others will not be, so I presume that he will be paid.

Then we found, as I mentioned a moment ago, that here was this extraordinary situation of there not being a single social scientist on the board. This whole neglect of the social sciences carried through to the extent that when SCITEC, which is an umbrella association covering these scientific societies in Canada, was set up originally—and Senator Lamontagne, Senator Cameron, Senator Carter and I were there—one of the first questions put to us was, "Do you think it is really necessary to allow the social sciences in?" Well, that problem was resolved.

Part V deals with the National Research Council, and I have covered that. In part VI the National Defence Act is amended to discontinue or abandon the Defence Research Board. I am not quite sure how this will be achieved, and perhaps in committee, or elsewhere, we will have an answer to an extraordinary procedure which is quite new to me. We are told that this bill merely confirms or regularizes what was done in 1974: "under the authority of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act." It appears that this board, set up by an act of Parliament, was abandoned and abolished under another act. It is quite possible that that could be so, but it seems an extraordinary thing that we should have an act which would allow, if it does, the government to use the authority of an act such as the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act to make a fundamental change such as has been made here. Perhaps we could have an explanation of that. Certainly, I am not aware of that act, and

I am not aware of how it has been used. Also, the Defence Research Board appears to have been downgraded. It reports at a very low level, and it seems to me that it should be reporting at least to an assistant deputy minister, as a similar board in agriculture is doing now.

The Medical Research Council has been notoriously starved for funds in the last few years—so much so that the government has practically been forced to add to its necessary resources by supplementary estimates three times in the last 18 months or two years. Its resources are to be increased, we are told, and it will now have an additional function in the whole field of public health. It is not quite in agreement with the recommendations of the Senate committee but, by and large, the concept matches the broad concept of our report.

Parts VIII and IX are consequential and transitional. They are of no great importance except to provide for carrying on the personnel of these research councils and boards until the various clauses of the bill are proclaimed.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I say that I support this bill in view of its relevance to the report of the Senate committee. It is a step in the right direction. At least, it does indicate that the government has taken the Senate report, assessed it, examined it in connection with many other studies and reached certain conclusions. I would not complain too greatly if it has not reached exactly the same conclusions so long as the broad concepts appear to have been implemented, as they have.

The main problem outstanding, then, is the entrenched departmental and bureaucratic fortresses. I said at the outset that it is shocking that there is no evidence whatsoever that the government, having decided on a priority policy, is able to have that policy implemented by its various departments. The funding of industry is one example, but there are many others. I believe that the new minister, Mr. Faulkner, who has been before the committee and whom I have had the pleasure of meeting on other occasions, means business. We tried in the committee to suggest to him that one important aspect of the implementation of this bill would be the upgrading of the position of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology. It is now at the level of a ministry of state, not a full department. We are told that this difference between a departmental responsibility and a mere ministerial responsibility does not have the same significance as it has in Britain, but certainly it has been taken as an indication of the low level of importance of this department. Why this is so, I do not know.

● (2130)

The total funding by the federal government of science and technology this year will amount to $1.664 billion in a total budget of about $30 billion. Certainly that alone would justify the upgrading of this ministry. We have had some evidence that the ministry under Mr. Faulkner is making considerable progress in upgrading its position in the cabinet. Certainly it seems to be following one of our very major recommendations, not in the immediate field of this bill but in the general field of science policy, and that is that we should have a visible science budget. We seem to be getting very close to the point where there will be a totally visible science budget before the budget goes to Treasury Board.

As one who has worked along with Senator Lamontagne on this committee for a good many years now, very often with great frustration, I have to say at this time that I believe times are changing. I believe that government science policy is starting to move in the right direction. This bill is one instance of that. It is, as I said, a step in the right direction. But the special Senate committee has concluded its hearings. It will bring in a report in due course. The committee will cease to exist, and then Canada will be in the unique and absurd position among the modern nations of the world of being just about the only one that does not have a science and technology committee in either house. There are signs that something may be done about this. One would hope in due course there will be a science and technology committee established in the other house. Certainly the discussions on this bill and other activities indicate that there are today a handful—more than a handful—of members of the House of Commons active, interested and well informed on science policy. The nucleus is there.

I am sure all of us on the committee will regret the existence of this temporary vacuum. It will not be in the best interests of Canadian science, the Canadian economy or Canadian society. The suggestion has been made that there should be established a joint committee, and I do not know what may come of that. But certainly as our committee ceases to exist, as it will very shortly, there will be a vacuum—and a serious vacuum—in the whole area of Canadian science policy.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if Senator Carter speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to adjourn the debate in order to make some very brief remarks.

Senator Choquette: As brief as the others we have just heard?

Senator Forsey: I can make them now for that matter. I am perfectly happy to do so, but I am afraid I may be interfering with some plans for Senator Walker to speak to us tonight, and I have a much higher regard for Senator Walker's eloquence than I have for my own.

In spite of the modified raptures of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, I must confess that I remain an unrevised and unrepentant supporter of the speech which Senator Hicks made last night. The speech of Senator Grosart was, shall I say, a eulogy of a bill which more or less, it appears, follows the recommendations of the committee of which he was so distinguished a member. I think as the speech went on it became clearer and clearer that it was very much a case of "more or less". He pointed out one deficiency after another in the bill from the point of view of the members of the committee on science policy. Much of what he said, however, it seemed to me was simply underlining the point that Senator Hicks had made that there was very little wrong that could not be cured by providing more money for the existing agencies. He referred to the almost complete neglect of the social sciences by the Canada Council, and I am inclined to think that that comment is a little bit out of date—that it was true some years ago, but it is no longer true now.

I simply conclude by saying that in my judgment, for the reasons given by Senator Hicks most thoroughly and eloquently last night, this is foolish legislation which is wasting the time of Parliament, and if Senator Hicks or anybody else wishes to divide the house on it I shall be very happy to vote against the bill.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Carter speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Grosart, Senator Hicks and Senator Forsey for the valuable contributions they have made to this debate. As Senator Grosart pointed out, Bill C-26 reflects in large measure the recommendations made by the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy, and that is a source of pride to me personally, and I think it is a source of pride to the Senate as a whole.

I heartily join with Senator Grosart in the tribute he paid to Senator Lamontagne as chairman of that committee, and I thank him for the very kind references he made to myself. But I would point out that Senator Grosart was all too modest in minimizing his own contributions to that committee, which were of enormous proportions.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Carter: I owe a special debt of gratitude to Senator Grosart because he has assisted me considerably in replying to the criticisms voiced at the last sitting by Senator Hicks and supported a few moments ago by Senator Forsey. Senator Hicks and Senator Forsey complained about the splitting away of the granting functions from the existing bodies. In this connection I think it is important to remember that the changes which are proposed in Bill C-26 are not the result of somebody's dream, and they were not plucked out of thin air. They were arrived at after consideration of advice from a number of sources, including the Glassco Commission, the Macdonald Study Group, the Science Council, the OECD, the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy, and every one of them recommended this change, that the granting functions be separated from the NRC and from the Science Council.

● (2140)

One very good reason for setting up separate granting bodies for various disciplines in the area of university research is to provide the same mandate established by the statute for all disciplines. This was not the case before. The president of the NRC often found himself in a difficult position, and in some respects an ambiguous one, in that as well as having certain intergovernmental responsibilities, he was responsible for supporting research in the universities as well as research in the industrial sector. Evidence presented to the Science Policy Committee made it plain that the Science Council was already spending 80 per cent of its time on the granting function, and this did not leave, in the view of the Senate Science Policy Committee, sufficient time to devote to the very large scientific laboratories operated by the NRC. The freeing of the NRC of the granting function, therefore, will enable it to devote much more time to this very important research function.

The reports of the studies referred to earlier, including that of the OECD and the Science Council, all stressed the necessity for a definition of science policy. If you look in the dictionary you will see that science is described or defined as "the organization of knowledge to meet human needs." The government has adopted a definition of science policy as, "the organization of scientific activities to achieve national goals and objectives". This is the definition on which Bill C-26 is based, and it is on this basis that Bill C-26 ought to be judged. It is obvious that this approach of the government is somewhat different from that of the scientific community. This gives rise to different schools of thought with respect to basic research. Perhaps I should say "apparent differences," because actually there is no real difference of opinion as far as the importance of basic research is concerned. There is, however, a difference of emphasis, because the government's emphasis arises from its responsibility to make the maximum use of limited funds to achieve national goals. Obviously that means, with respect to the funds available, that the best possible balance must be struck between basic research and technological development leading to marketable products.

The approach of the scientific community is similar to that voiced by Senator Hicks, in terms of which, if I can paraphrase what he said, you pick the best person you can find, provide him with the funds, and then let him pursue his own course.

That is very fine as far as it goes, and if funds were unlimited we could then have the very best of both worlds; but that course of action is based on the theory that basic research is at one end of a continuous spectrum leading to technological innovation and new marketable products.

Senator Hicks: And is it not?

Senator Carter: This is not the case. Perhaps I should say that it is not always the case, since sometimes it is. But a great deal of innovation results from improved design and improvements in technology rather than from scientific research.

A study carried out by MIT discovered that a considerable proportion of innovation resulted not from scientific research but from the reactions of users of the products themselves, who discovered flaws, and ways of improving the article or product in question.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senator, may I really ask if you think that MIT is a case that you could quote as being against the proposition of basic research? This is surely taking an institute which has a world-wide reputation for basic research completely out of its context. The way to promote applied research is certainly not to destroy basic research.

Senator Carter: Well, I can refer my friend to Arthur Koestler, who said in his book The Act of Creation, that Faraday's lack of knowledge of mathematics and Edison's lack of science were assets to both these gentlemen. I would also point out that the classic example of this is the steam engine. The steam engine did not result from any research into the laws of thermodynamics.

Senator Hicks: But it all had to be done before the steam engine could have been built.

Senator Carter: The people who discovered the steam engine had very little knowledge of the laws of thermodynamics. What they were doing was trying to solve the problem of pumping water out of mines, and it was their addressing themselves to that problem which led to the invention of the steam engine. Scientific research had very little to do with it.

Senator Perrault: They are working on the perpetual motion machine over there.

Senator Hicks: I could reply—

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

Senator Carter: If my honourable friend wants another example, I can refer him to Dr. John Hughes of the lobster hatchery in the state research laboratory at Vineyard Station in Massachusetts. Dr. Hughes has devoted a great deal of his time to research in the commercial farming of lobsters. He has said that we have already all the biological research we need for this purpose but that we lack the engineering systems, the designing systems, and the hardware for water quality control and automatic feeding.

This is the point of the emphasis in this legislation on not giving all the credit to basic research but rather acknowledging the contribution which can be made by engineers, designers, and other technologists, to the solving of problems and the achieving of national goals.

Senator Choquette: You really are closing the debate, aren't you?

Senator Smith (Colchester): He hasn't closed it yet.

Senator Carter: With respect to the Science Council, not everybody's experience with it has been as happy as that of Senator Hicks and Senator Forsey.

Senator Hicks: I have never had any experience with the Science Council. Are you mistaken, sir?

Senator Carter: Well, I am not going to take time to read what you said.

Senator Hicks: My honourable friend referred previously to the Science Council when he meant the National Research Council. Did you mean the National Research Council just now?

Senator Carter: I understood that you deplored the setting up of a separate council for the humanities and the social sciences. The reason for that is that the social sciences and the humanities have grown tremendously in recent years, as Senator Grosart pointed out a few moments ago. Also, social problems have also grown and today are the most serious problems facing Canada and, indeed, most nations.

● (2150)

Senator Hicks referred to extra administrative costs. As I pointed out in my introductory remarks, the same personnel which now exist will be divided up among the new organizations. Very few extra personnel will be required apart from the three presidents of the new granting institutions. In any case, administrative expenses account for only 2 per cent of the total.

With respect to the Defence Research Board, the bill merely legalizes what is already the practice. The research establishment of the Defence Research Board have already been integrated into the Department of National Defence. This will be of benefit to them because, as the minister pointed out, the capital expenditures with respect to defence will be increased by 12 per cent, plus inflation, and so the funds available to those laboratories will be greater than they would be under the present system.

There has been some criticism of the Inter-Council Committee. I believe Senator Hicks referred to it as being on the inter-bureaucratic level. The Inter-Council will be made up of the heads or presidents of the three granting institutions. They will be coming into the government from the scientific community and will later return to the scientific community when their contract expires. Therefore it is hardly fair to refer to them as bureaucrats.

Senator Grosart referred to the fact that each of these new bodies will report to different ministers. I agree with what the Senate committee recommended, that they should report through a single minister. The ICC will obviate that to some extent because it will enable the heads of the three bodies to come together to discuss their mutual problems. They have a channel to the government through the Ministry of Science and Technology.

Senator Choquette: May I be permitted a question? Does the honourable senator intend to send this bill to committee?

Senator Carter: Yes. I have one further comment to make, which is in reply to Senator Grosart's question concerning parts I and III being separate acts. I am told that Parts I and III are already in the form of separate acts. They are exactly in the form they would be in if they were introduced as separate bills. When they are written up in the consolidated statutes they will be written up as individual acts.

I notice that the time is getting on, and it will be my intention to move that the bill be referred to committee.

Senator Grosart: Wait for second reading.

Senator Carter: I will be glad to terminate my remarks, unless honourable senators wish me to continue further.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Grosart, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that this bill be now read a second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

An Hon. Senator: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Carter moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hicks, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rowe, for the second reading of the Bill C-12, intituled: "An Act to implement conventions between Canada and Morocco, Canada and Pakistan, Canada and Singapore, Canada and the Philippines, Canada and the Dominican Republic and Canada and Switzerland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax".—(Honourable Senator Grosart).

Senator Grosart: Stand.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, since I do not expect to be present during the rest of this week, may I be permitted to answer the question that was asked last night by Senator Inman? I do not purport to close the debate, but merely to reply to the question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senators Hicks: The question was:

Would the honourable senator permit a question? Has he any idea of the dollar value, annually, of the dividends and interest received by Canadian citizens from Pakistan?

The answer is that the Department of National Revenue does not maintain a breakdown of the dividends and interest received by Canadian citizens from foreign countries such as Pakistan. However, in 1971 a special student project did tabulate some figures, and accordingly I am able to tell the house that for that year, 1971, interest paid by Canadian residents—which presumably includes Canadian corporate residents—to Pakistan residents amounted to approximately $7,600, and dividends, $6,950. I would think it safe to speculate that the amount which travelled in the reverse direction was substantially less than that.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the second reading of Bill C-3 to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, at this late hour it is certainly not my intention to keep you here for long, but it is my duty to try to present a short resume of this bill, and I hope that you will find it of interest.

In brief, the bill proposes to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act. The main purpose of the bill is to permit the board of directors of the corporation to rebate—I underline the word "rebate"—some or all of the premiums paid by member institutions each year if the board is convinced that the deposit insurance fund is adequate or is growing at an adequate rate.

I have been in Parliament for quite a few years, and I have not known many bills which purport to rebate. In my view, it is a very healthy trend.

Apart from that the amendments are really of a housekeeping nature, to cure certain administrative problems and certain problems of interpretation which have arisen during the 10 years since the bill has been in force and in effect.

Before describing any of the proposed amendments in detail, it may be useful to comment briefly on the purpose and history of this act. The Canadian Deposit Corporation Act was passed in 1967 and had, for its main purpose, the establishment of the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation.

May I from now on, in referring to this long title, merely cite it as the CDIC? The corporation was formed for the purpose of ensuring deposits made in banks, trust companies and loan companies. The insurance covers each depositor up to the extent of $20,000 in each institution.

● (2200)

The latest figures show that the CDIC insures deposits in 94 member institutions. Twelve of these are banks, 36 are federally incorporated trust companies or loan companies, and 46 are provincially incorporated trust companies or loan companies. The total insured deposits held by the institutions at the end of 1976 were just under $56 billion.

The act provides that each member institution must pay a premium representing a proportion of the insured deposits. The premium is fixed at 1/30th of one per cent of the insured deposits, but this may be reduced under a formula presently in the act where the board of directors considers that the fund is sufficient to permit such a reduction.

During 1976 the premium income for the corporation amounted to $11,759,000, and at the end of that year the total assets of the corporation amounted to $125 million.

All federally incorporated banks, trust companies and loan companies are required to become members of the deposit insurance plan. Provincially incorporated trust companies and loan companies may become members if they have the authority of their home jurisdiction and if their financial position is acceptable to the CDIC. I suppose that, in explanation, provincially incorporated companies can, with the acquiescence of their province of incorporation, become members and also be subject to a proper system of supervision.

The Province of Quebec has a deposit insurance plan applying to deposit-taking institutions in that province. However, the Quebec plan insures only deposits in Quebec; deposits outside Quebec incorporated institutions are insured by the CDIC. The CDIC insures deposits in all federally incorporated institutions, whether the deposits are accepted in Quebec or outside Quebec.

Apart from the basic function of the CDIC under the act of providing deposit insurance, it has other powers of an incidental or ancillary nature, such as the authority to assist member institutions through the making of loans and the purchase of their assets. CDIC can also act as liquidator or receiver of a member institution when appointed by a court, and in such cases assumes the related expenses.

The corporation is managed by a board of directors, consisting of the chairman, who is appointed from outside the public service, and four other directors who are ex officio, namely, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Deputy Minister of Finance, the Superintendent of Insurance, and the Inspector General of Banks.

The most important of the amendments proposed in the bill relates to the growth of the assets of the CDIC and the rate of premium that should, as a consequence, be charged to member institutions. Although there is presently a formula in the act to reduce the premium rate below the basic rate of 1/30th of one per cent of the insured deposit, it has been found that the rate of increase in deposits has been much greater than anticipated when this formula was written into the legislation in 1967. As a result, it seems that the premium payments are now enough, or perhaps more than enough, to permit the deposit insurance fund to maintain a reasonable growth rate. It is to be kept in mind that the fund increases not only by premium payments each year but also by investment income earned.

It is not possible, of course, to be absolutely certain what size of the fund is reasonable in relation to any particular volume of deposits. However, it seems that, having in mind the investment income and the present premium level, the fund is growing at a more rapid rate than would be necessary to meet any reasonable assessment of risks resting upon it.

The bill proposes that the board of directors be authorized to rebate some or all of the premiums paid each year, should they conclude that the fund has reached an adequate level or is such that it need not continue to grow at the rate that would result if full premiums were paid.

In connection with the growth of the fund, the bill deals with another matter. It would authorize the directors to repay to the government the original capital of $10 million, should the directors consider that the fund is reasonably adequate for the purpose in hand. When the corporation was created, the initial capital was provided by the government in order to give a starting base. In recent years the corporation has paid interest on this fund. However, now that the fund seems to be reaching a point where it is more or less adequate, it seems that this original capital base could be refunded, thus letting the corporation operate on a wholly self-sustaining base. The bill therefore proposes that the CDIC have the power to redeem its shares and abolish the share capital structure. It is to be noted that, even if this action is taken, the corporation would still remain a crown corporation under the control of the government, as is provided elsewhere in the act.

A further amendment proposed in the bill concerns the definition of "deposits". When the act was originally passed, the board of directors was authorized to define that expression for purposes of the act. However, about a year later the act was amended and a limit was placed on the power of the board to alter the definition of "deposits". It is now proposed that the definition of "deposit" be included in a schedule to the act. At the same time, a few changes are proposed in the definition of "deposits".

The present definition of "deposits," broadly speaking, includes all demand deposits in Canadian dollars and all term deposits having a maturity of five years or less. Term deposits in this sense would include guaranteed investment certificates issued by trust companies and debentures issued by mortgage loan companies. One of the changes proposed in the definition would withdraw deposit insurance from debentures or deposit receipts that are issued in bearer form. Since insurance is limited to $20,000 per person per institution, it is essential that the deposits be in registered form in order that a determination may be made concerning the amount of deposit insurance. When the act was originally passed this was not considered to be a problem, but in recent years there seems to have been some tendency towards the use of bearer-type instruments.

Another amendment would withdraw deposit insurance from issues of debentures or other securities that are payable outside Canada. Debentures payable outside Canada would be primarily intended for sale in foreign countries. It is considered that to provide deposit insurance in such circumstances stretches the original intention of the act beyond that of insuring what are normally considered as deposits. It should be clear that this change will not withdraw deposit insurance from a non-resident who places his funds on deposit with an institution in Canada.

A further minor amendment would give CDIC authority to guarantee expenses of a liquidator of a member institution. Such expenses can now be paid by CDIC if it is itself appointed as liquidator, but it is felt that circumstances may arise where it would not be appropriate for CDIC to act in this role. It is thought that circumstances might arise where it would be in the interests of CDIC to be able to pay the liquidator's expenses rather than have them taken out of the assets of the company being liquidated.

The remainder of the proposals are of a minor nature and for the most part intended to clarify existing provisions. Among these is the change that would provide for the designation of an alternate for a director who might be unable to attend the meeting of the board. It is also felt that the provisions of the act regarding subrogation of the CDIC to the rights of a depositor who has been paid off by CDIC should be clarified.

Honourable senators, that is an attempt to give a short résumé of the bill. Other things being equal, after the debate has ended I would hope that honourable senators would agree to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if I might ask Senator Macnaughton a question. Has CDIC paid out any sums during its life, and if so how much?

Senator Macnaughton: Yes, I was hoping that perhaps my honourable friend, who may be speaking next, will give some of these figures, but so long as I do not trespass on his territory, I have an answer to that question. In nine years, the loss to the corporation has been $600,000. One claim during this time was for $25 million. By a process of not winding it up and not selling the assets quickly, but sort of dragging it out over the years, they were able to re-collect all but $600,000. This is quite a record.

Hon. David J. Walker: Honourable senators, when I hear my friend, I look back to 20 years ago when he was the chairman of that tough Public Accounts Committee, and I was his counsel. I watched his career as the Speaker of the House of Commons, and his leaving the House of Commons to give up his seat in Mount Royal to the present Prime Minister. It is good to see him in this house, and I am always glad to listen to him. Tonight I will have very little to say because he has covered the waterfront.

The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is a success story among crown corporations in Canada. I do not know of any other company that has been more successful. I think that is largely because politics have kept out of it, and the members of the board of directors include deputy ministers, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and other people of equal prominence.

The main purpose of the act is one that is very necessary, to provide deposit insurance for the protection of you, me and all the other citizens who make deposits in banks and trust companies against the loss of their deposits. This is something that has tormented people for generations, and now we know that it cannot happen. As my friend has said, the insurance covers a deposit up to $20,000. If you have $100,000 extra, Senator Molson, just spread it among five banks so that you are fully protected. Under this insurance, all federally-incorporated companies are compelled to subscribe to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. Provincial corporations are not so compelled, but there are at least 40 provincial loan companies and trust companies that have joined this corporation.

The results of the success of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation have brought the directors to the question of what will they do? Its growth has been so rapid and successful, and it has made so much money, that they are saying, "What are we going to do with it?" It is a nice change to note that they are discussing the idea of giving a rebate, so that at the end of any year they can consider how well they have done, and rebate the whole of the premium to all of the subscribers during that year. It is an excellent idea. I make this suggestion—and I have not heard it made before—that they might even go further and raise the amount of coverage from $20,000 to $25,000. Now that we have inflation, a $25,000 bank account does not compare with a $20,000 bank account of just a few years ago.

It is an excellent idea to get rid of the share capital structure of the company, which this bill proposes doing under clause 3, and return the $10 million the Treasury put up originally. It does not seem very much now, in view of the tremendous amount of money that has been accumulated. Clause 1 defines the meaning of "deposit". Clause 5 guarantees the fees of a liquidator of a member institution. A bankruptcy can happen at any time. It usually happens at the time when it is least expected. When it does happen, it is very important that this crown agency can step in, appoint a liquidator, and get the defunct company back on its feet as quickly as possible.

I could go on and on, but the honourable sponsor has covered the whole problem very well. All I can say is that the bill is an excellent one. It covers many facets which require covering.

I, as do all honourable senators, wish this corporation success in the future. I hope that the directors will learn to dispose of all the extra money they are accumulating—not all of it, but a certain amount of it—by either lessening the amount of the premium necessary, or giving a return on those premiums to the subscribers.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Macnaughton moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Andrew Thompson moved the second reading of Bill C-6, respecting Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, appreciating the lateness of the hour, I will try to be as brief as I can in my statement concerning this bill.

The purpose of Bill C-6 is to give greater certainty to the law governing the status of foreign diplomatic and consular personnel who are accredited to Canada. It is not intended to change the treatment now being accorded to such personnel in Canada, but, rather, to place Canadian law on a statutory basis that reflects the most recent developments in international law. By legislating in this area, Parliament will also insure that the status of diplomatic and consular personnel will be the same wherever they may be in Canada.

By way of a brief background, during the hundreds of years in which states have exchanged diplomatic and consular representatives, a body of practice has developed concerning the manner in which these representatives were to be treated in the states to which they had been assigned and in which they carried out their duties. From this practice there emerged a body of international law based upon custom. This law applies to all states which are members of the international community of nations, independent of any treaty or convention. When two states agree to exchange diplomatic or consular representatives, they automatically become bound to accord a certain level of treatment to each other's representatives, unless, of course, through bilateral agreement, they agree between themselves upon a different level of treatment.

This body of international law based upon custom has, by the operation of rules of common law, been incorporated into the common law of Canada, and has been applied by Canadian courts on that basis for many years.

The Charter of the United Nations assigns to the General Assembly the task "of encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification." In accordance with that mandate, the General Assembly convened in 1961 a major international conference to set down in a convention the law relating to diplomatic relations. The result was the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. In 1963 a similar conference adopted the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations. Those two conventions are annexed to this bill, giving force of law in Canada to certain of their provisions.

There are 117 states which are now party to the Diplomatic Convention, and 79 to the Consular Convention. Canada became a party to the Diplomatic Convention in June 1966, and to the Consular Convention in August 1974. Canada was able to accept the obligations of those conventions at that time without first seeking legislation of the kind proposed in this bill because the obligations placed upon Canada by those conventions reflected almost entirely the pre-existing principles of customary international law, to which I referred earlier, which formed part of the Canadian common law. Nevertheless, in any major law codification process, such as is represented by the 1961 and 1963 conventions, there is, inevitably, a clarification of uncertain points and a greater degree of precision than is contained in a body of law founded entirely upon custom and practices. It is desirable that this process of clarification and precision which has taken place on the international level be reflected in our internal laws, and that is the purpose of this bill.

I might say in this connection that similar legislation already exists in other major common law jurisdictions, notably Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand. In the United States, of course, any treaty ratified by the Senate automatically has force of law.

It is important to note that the persons to whom these immunities are accorded are not above the law. International law places a formal obligation upon them to respect the laws and regulations of the receiving state. That obligation is formally stated in article 41 of the Diplomatic Convention and article 55 of the Consular Convention. Failure to observe Canadian laws and regulations may lead to formal representation to the government of the sending state and, ultimately, in serious cases, to the expulsion from Canada of the person or persons concerned.

The immunity of diplomatic and consular personnel from the administrative and personnel judicial systems of the receiving state reflects the fact that these people are sent and received as representatives of their governments. One state does not normally seek to subject to its own judicial processes the government of another state. Similarly, the so-called privileges, which amount, in effect, to exemption from certain forms of taxation, reflect the fact that one state does not normally tax another, at least in relation to its governmental as distinct from commercial activities.

The objective which the establishment of a system of privileges and immunities seeks to accomplish is to ensure that the members of the diplomatic or consular posts are able to perform their legitimate duties without interference by the receiving state. Honourable senators will realize that the conventions established systems for the protection of diplomatic and consular missions and their personnel in all parts of the world, including many countries where the rule of law and the freedom of the individual are not regarded as they are in Canada. This is a factor of particular importance to Canada, whose foreign political, economic and commercial relations are essential to the security and economic well-being of our country. We have a large number of diplomatic and consular personnel abroad in more than 100 posts working to advance the interests of all Canadians. Their ability to function effectively—indeed, in some cases, their personal safety and that of their families—depends largely upon a well-established international system governing their status in countries where they are serving Canada. And, of course, what one state asks for its representatives it must be prepared to accord to the representatives of other states.

I should like to refer briefly to the contents of the bill itself. The substance of the bill can be found in clause 2. I should explain why that clause enumerates only certain articles of the two conventions. As their titles indicate, the conventions are not concerned only with privileges and immunities, but with diplomatic and consular relations generally. Honourable senators will have noted in the conventions annexed to the bill many provisions which do not require force of law in Canada for their implementation. The articles which are enumerated in clause 2 are those which establish, or are related to, specific privileges and immunities, including those which may affect the rights of private persons as distinct from those articles which are purely formal and which create only obligations between governments.

Clause 2(4) is intended to enable the Canadian government, when any of the provisions of the conventions are not being fully applied to Canadian representatives abroad, to apply similar restrictions to the representatives in Canada of the foreign governments concerned. A provision of this kind is necessary to give to the Canadian government the leverage it would need to negotiate a settlement to any dispute which might arise over the application of the conventions.

With respect to clause 6, because the provisions of the two conventions referred to in clause 2(1) will apply to representatives of all countries, including Commonwealth countries, there will no longer be a need for special legislation concerning representatives from Commonwealth countries. For this reason, it is appropriate to repeal the Diplomatic Immunities (Commonwealth Countries) Act.

Finally, the bill relates only to the diplomatic and consular missions of other countries in Canada and to members of the staffs of such missions. It does not relate to the treatment that Canada may accord to international organizations, including representatives of member states, or others, who may enter Canada to attend international conferences.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, I do not rise specifically to oppose this bill, nor do I propose to take very long. However, some of the explanations, I feel, given in good faith by the sponsor of the bill, ought to have some examination. They do not appeal to me as being very convincing reasons.

For instance, he told us that Canada signed—I have forgotten the phrase he used—or acceded to the convention with reference to diplomatic privileges in 1966, which is now 11 years ago, give or take a few months. So, why it has suddenly become essential, in order to protect the activities of Canadians abroad, or of other people in this country, to produce this law and pass it is a little beyond comprehension. If we were able to get along for 11 years without crisis, at a time when most of the world has been in a state of crisis—going from one crisis to another, I think would be a good way of describing our experience of the last few years—why is it now considered necessary to take up the time of Parliament to put in a statute something which the sponsor of the bill says is already in the common law.

Indeed, I am not sure that he should have used the phrase “common law.” He will forgive me if I mention this, but I do not suppose the phrase “common law” extends beyond those provinces which accepted the common law of England as the basis for their non-statutory laws. However, I believe he would have been correct if he had said that international conventions of this kind have reached such a stage of understanding that they would be acceptable, if not with the force of law, as something which the courts would readily enforce if it ever came to a matter of litigation. Therefore, I believe there must be some other reason for asking Parliament at this time to give its sanction to only parts of these conventions.

I do not assert, but I cannot help but wonder whether the timing is related to the fact that one of the provinces of Canada a year or so ago introduced legislation regarding this sort of thing which was substantially at variance with the provisions of these conventions or, at least, one of them. If that be so, I do not know why the government does not frankly admit that this is the reason.

The second convention, the consular convention, was acceded to in 1974, which is three years ago, and Parliament has not been any busier in the past than it has been in this particular session. Therefore, again it seems a little difficult to understand why this sudden need has been perceived now. Of course, the credibility of the allegation of the sudden need is not increased by the fact that this bill received its first reading in the other place on October 21, 1976 and only made its way here the other day, which is not a very convincing exhibition of the urgency with which the government regarded its passage. Indeed, one might very well wonder about the skillfulness of the management of the business of the other place on the part of the government when this bill suddenly comes to us in what is alleged to be the dying portion of this session, rather than being speedily dealt with and passed along to us through the processes of the other house long since. Indeed, I believe it only came up for second reading in the other house early this month.

It is correct, I believe, to agree with the honourable senator that these functions merely express the methods of procedure and privileges and immunities of diplomatic and consular persons, personages and property which have been recognized by international law and custom over a very long period of time. I agree with him that these are useful and necessary customs and conventions, and that we should be alert not only to practice them ourselves, but to do what we can to see that other countries which are signatories, and even those which are not, follow them. The honourable senator said that this statute will ensure—I could be paraphrasing him a little; I cannot write as fast as he speaks, but I think I am able to paraphrase him with reasonable accuracy—the same treatment for diplomatic people in all other countries as is accorded them in Canada. With all respect to him, I think it does nothing of the kind. Whatever action of ours was needed to be directed toward this point was taken when we acceded to these conventions, and nothing we can do by way of enacting them into law will have the slightest effect upon other countries.

The honourable sponsor said that 117 countries, or something like that, adhere to these conventions, but I noticed that when he was telling us how many countries had actually done something about it legislatively he was pretty well confined to a few Commonwealth countries, and then thought it necessary to explain that the United States had not done this because what the U.S. Senate did in relation to foreign treaties was considered to be law there.

He also indicated that this bill would provide greater clarification and certainty of interpretation to the situation as it now exists. I certainly would not contradict him, but I will have to say that nothing he said and nothing I see in this bill would support such an allegation. In my opinion, the situation as far as certainty and clarification goes is precisely as it was before.

Senator Thompson referred—and quite correctly, if he will permit me to say so—to the fact that this bill provides that all signatories shall respect the laws of the receiving state. That is very important indeed, especially having regard to the immunity from a great many processes of law, including the criminal law, which is afforded to those representing the sending state. However, I do have to draw attention to the fact that this provision, in some respect at least, seems to have not been very carefully observed by some of the people we have received in Canada. I understand, for instance, that during 1975 some 5,516 foreign diplomats were accused of breaking Canadian laws, but were not charged because they invoked diplomatic immunity. It seems to me that this is a situation which merits some attention.

The honourable senator said that if this provision of the convention was not properly respected the receiving state could invoke its right to take disciplinary action in the sense of indicating to the sending state that those concerned were persona non grata, which I understand in international convention means that in due course they would be withdrawn. It seems to me that if we are, indeed, in a situation in which some 5,500 offences are alleged to have been committed by foreign diplomats in one year in our country, and none of these offenders were charged because they invoked diplomatic immunity, it is time to take a very hard look at this situation. I suspect, without knowing it to be the case but hoping it is, that Canadian representatives in other lands are clearly told by their superiors in the Department of External Affairs that if they break the laws consistently, or even occasionally, of the state in which they have been extended hospitality, they will be disciplined by Canada. It seems to me just a little less than satisfactory when this sort of situation exists.

● (2240)

Having said that, I return again to what I said at first, that I do not oppose this bill. I see no particular good to be accomplished by its passage, but I see no particular harm either. Therefore, I do not suggest that there should be any opposition to it.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Thompson speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I appreciate very much the questions which Senator Smith has raised. I do not think I can adequately answer all of them—certainly not in detail. I would say, however, in connection with his reference to the fact that in Quebec there was discussion with the National Assembly a few years ago with respect to a bill—which was quite different from this bill—concerning diplomatic and consular privileges and immunities in that province, doubts were expressed at that time concerning the constitutional validity of certain of the provisions of the Quebec bill, and those doubts were communicated to the Quebec government. The Minister of External Affairs at that time, the Honourable A. J. MacEachen, discussed the matter with the then Quebec Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs, and a series of discussions took place between federal and Quebec authorities. During this period the bill was not advanced in the National Assembly. I would also point out, by the way, that the first reading of this bill in the House of Commons came before the election of the new government in Quebec.

The extensive discussions with Quebec certainly led to a more general review within the federal government of the legal situation in Canada regarding diplomatic and consular privileges and immunities. This review in turn led to the submission of Bill C-6 to Parliament. But, if this bill had not been introduced now, it would have had to be introduced eventually for the reasons I stated previously. It is a perfectly normal piece of national legislation in a common law country. Not being a lawyer, I still use the term “common law” without perhaps understanding the implications of the reservations Senator Smith cited in disputing it. Again, I come to the point that I am aware that the common law countries of Britain, Australia and New Zealand have passed this national legislation. To suggest that the bill is somehow directed at, or motivated solely by, one Canadian province is to ignore its obvious purposes which, as I have said, are to bring greater certainty and precision to a body of law which already exists and is being applied throughout Canada—and I suspect my friend disagrees with this—and to ensure uniformity in the status and legal regime governing diplomatic and consular personnel, wherever they may be in Canada.

I could go on to deal with the 5,000 abuses which have been mentioned, for example, but I would suggest that a great many of those, while they are nevertheless irritating, are actually parking violations. There is a procedure in connection with this type of offence which the Canadian government tries to practise, and which it applies to Canadian representatives in other countries. It is clearly stated in the Vienna Conference Convention that there is a clear obligation on foreign diplomats in Canada to observe Canadian laws and regulations. The government regards it as important that all foreign diplomats respect all Canadian laws and regulations, including those concerned with parking. As I have said, parking violations accounted for most of this high number of abuses.

It should be recalled that while diplomatic officers enjoy immunity, all other members of a diplomatic mission and all members of a consular mission enjoy immunity only in respect of acts performed in the exercise of their official functions.

The minister, through his department, keeps a close check on all offences, and his department emphasizes to each of the 130 diplomatic missions accredited to Ottawa the seriousness with which the government regards the obligation under the conventions that diplomats should respect Canadian laws and regulations.

I believe there was one particular country which Senator Smith tactfully and diplomatically declined to name, one particular country which had a rather outstanding number of traffic offences at one point. In this particular case the protocol office informed the head of that particular mission that this was really an excessive number of traffic violations; consequently, the following year there was a considerable reduction, by four-fifths, in the traffic violations taking place as compared to the year before.

Obviously, if it comes to a real issue with a country, then the head of the mission is informed, and a particular offender can be declared persona non grata and can be required to depart.

Honourable senators, I think any further questions would be more adequately answered in committee by the officials of the department and I would therefore suggest that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, assuming it receives second reading.

Senator Grosart: Would the honourable senator permit a question? I understood him to say that this bill, if it becomes enacted, will apply throughout Canada. Can he explain to me how it can apply throughout Canada in respect of laws passed within the exclusive jurisdiction of a provincial legislature?

Senator Thompson: I understand—and Senator Smith raised this point about delay—that one of the reasons for delaying the bill was that there had to be concurrence on the part of the various provinces with respect to some parts of it. Consultation took place with all of the provinces, and they are in agreement with the two Conventions as approved by Canada. Therefore, the bill should be passed.

Senator Grosart: Can the honourable senator inform the Senate as to the basis of this so-called agreement, concurrence or consultation? We are dealing with something which has been in the exclusive jurisdiction of the legislatures. Will the legislatures pass similar acts?

Senator Thompson: No. I think there are two areas which could be said to be affected by provincial jurisdiction. I am sure you have studied the bill, and will recognize that with respect to exemptions from taxes there are two areas of diplomatic exemption—one for direct tax and one for income tax. Certain provinces have had the responsibility in some of these areas and, therefore, there has been consultation with the provinces concerning them. I suggest to Senator Grosart that a fuller and more adequate explanation will probably be forthcoming in the committee, but that is my understanding at the moment.

Senator Perrault: Co-operative federalism.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Thompson moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel Riley moved the second reading of Bill C-36, to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I thank you for according me the privilege of commencing the debate on second reading of this bill, and I give you my word that I shall limit my explanatory remarks to less than 60 minutes.

Responsibility for the federal government's role and leadership in the field of road and motor vehicle traffic safety was assigned to Transport Canada in 1967. Subsequent consultation and co-operation between the federal and provincial governments developed the Motor Vehicle Safety Act which was passed by Parliament and proclaimed effective January 1, 1971. Continued co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, and with the motor vehicle industry and consumer associations, has assisted in the development of improved safety performance, the enforcement of safety standards, and progress in the reduction of road fatalities and serious injuries.

The federal Department of Transport has concentrated its road safety programs in the areas of traffic safety research, international co-operation in road safety and the development of effective safety standards for the safe design, construction and functioning of new motor vehicles at the point of manufacture and importation.

The two main features of the act provide authority for the federal government to implement and enforce safety standards for vehicles manufactured after January 1, 1971, and to require manufacturers to issue notices to owners of any safety defects in vehicles, in a prescribed manner. Under the original act, "Safety Standards" means standards regulating the design, construction or functioning of motor vehicles and their components for the purpose of protecting persons against personal injury, impairment of health or death. The act defines a "motor vehicle" as any vehicle designed to be driven or drawn on roads. Thus the regulations are being applied to automobiles, trucks, buses, trailers, motorcycles and snowmobiles. The safety standards include specifications for crash avoidance characteristics, crashworthiness performance and environmental protection. Examples of crash avoidance standards are those related to steering, braking and vision. Examples of crashworthiness standards are those related to interior padding, bumpers, sidedoor strength, roof crush resistance, seat belts and flammability of materials. Environmental protection standards include limits on exhaust emissions, evaporative emissions and noise emissions.

The Canadian Motor Vehicle Safety Act places the responsibility for compliance with standards upon the manufacturers and importers of motor vehicles through self-certification.

Transport Canada audits the technical records of manufacturers and importers to ensure that they are acting responsibly in certifying vehicles to be in compliance with regulations. To further ensure compliance with the act and regulations, Transport Canada tests vehicles and components acquired on the open market, analyzes accident causes and injuries, reviews provincial motor vehicle inspection reports and evaluates information received from the general public.

Since the act was made effective in 1971, a large number of new safety standards have been introduced and an even greater number of amendments to these safety standards have been made. This reflects the rapid pace of change in automotive safety technology and the consequent need for the flexibility that regulations provide.

Since proclamation of the act on January 1, 1971, the number of motor vehicles registered in Canada has increased from 8.5 to 12.5 million, an increase of 50 per cent. Despite the increase in traffic density, over the same period of time the number of deaths per 100 million vehicle miles has fallen from 6.7 to an estimated 4.7, a decrease of 30 per cent. Activity under the act must account for a significant portion of this improvement in road safety. Clear indications of this activity are as follows:

- 76 new safety regulations and amendments developed, issued and implemented;

- 3.7 million vehicles recalled to correct safety-related deficiencies in them;

- 4,545 public complaints on possible safety-related defects investigated and resolved;

- 3,500 audit inspections of manufacturers and importers have been performed;

- 9,800 tests of vehicles and their components carried out to determine whether or not the federal safety standards are being complied with.

Furthermore, there is confirmed medical evidence of reductions in the severity of injuries incurred in motor vehicle accidents, and of a continuous reduction in the number of fatal and injury-producing accidents.

One of the most significant achievements has been the almost universal installation of seat belts in road-going vehicles. This achievement has made it realistic for provincial governments to make the wearing of seat belts mandatory. As you are aware, two provinces have already made the wearing of seat belts mandatory. When sufficient information on the effects of such provincial legislation is gathered, it is fully expected that dramatic savings of life and limb will have been accomplished.

Thus the Motor Vehicle Safety Act has been directly effective in producing safer motor vehicles of all types.

In the amending bill, Transport Canada is proposing improvements and clarification to make the legislation more effective. These proposed improvements reflect six years of experience in administering the Motor Vehicle Safety Act and regulations, and the complexities of the rapidly advancing technology in the industry.

The specific objectives of the bill are to remove doubts as to whom the act addresses, to require the retention of essential records, to make the notice of defect requirements more effective, to provide exemptions from some requirements in order to prevent technological development being inhibited, and to make the penalty for violation of the notice of defect requirements consistent with other penalties under the act and in other similar federal statutes.

These proposed changes will assist both the federal and provincial governments in achieving further improvements in the safety performance of motor vehicles and in fairly enforcing safety standards and safety regulations.

The new definition "manufacture" would be introduced to clarify the fact that the act addresses manufacturers who are in the business of completing vehicles built in two or more stages. It is quite common for trucks, vans and buses to be built in several stages, each manufacturer progressively adding to the vehicle until it is completed. Under the act in its present form there are some doubts among manufacturers and Transport Canada inspectors as to its application to second and later stage manufacturers.

● (2300)

The definition of "manufacture" makes it clear that anyone assembling or altering a vehicle for the purpose of sale of that vehicle at the retail level is considered to be a manufacturer, and therefore is subject to the requirements of the act.

The definition "motor vehicle" would be altered to make it clear that mopeds, mini-bikes and motorized snow vehicles are included, and are therefore subject to whatever regulations are applicable.

The definition "safety standards" would be altered by the addition of the word "identification" to confirm the authority to include in safety standards requirements for the proper identification and labelling of vehicles.

An amendment to require users of the national safety mark to retain records demonstrating that their vehicles comply with the applicable safety standards is recommended. This amendment would help in the work of the Transport Canada inspectors.

Presently, notices of defect, which are made visible through often-publicized manufacturers' recall campaigns, sometimes meet with limited success. This limited success is due to difficulties in obtaining current names and addresses of owners of the potentially faulty vehicles. What this amendment would do is to require manufacturers and importers to use provincial motor vehicle registration records, if available to them in suitable form, in addition to their own warranty records to determine current ownership of vehicles. If the names of owners cannot reasonably be determined by these means, the manufacturer or importer could be permitted to advise the public of the defect in vehicles for which it is responsible by the publication of notices in major newspapers.

Senator Asselin: Why don't you give your own résumé and disregard the speech written by the Ministry of Transport officer?

Senator Riley: I was going to go to Senator Asselin to have him help me, but I could not make an appointment. In the meantime, if I could counsel the honourable senator, he is not yet Speaker of this house and I will abide by the Speaker's ruling in such matters as this. Perhaps some day he may have the opportunity to become Speaker. Meanwhile, I suggest that he not interrupt, and by not interrupting he will not prolong my remarks. Has he anything to add?

Senator Asselin: I will wait until you have finished.

Senator Riley: Well, that is fine. I look forward to that.

Also included in this amendment is a requirement that a manufacturer or importer report the progress of a notice of defect campaign on a quarterly basis for a period of two years.

Currently no provisions exist for permitting manufacturers and importers to build or import vehicles which do not comply with all of the safety standards. This rigid state of affairs could inhibit technological development because, while introducing novel engine and vehicle designs in attempts to obtain greater fuel economies or overall vehicle safety, designers may find it initially impossible to meet certain safety standards as established.

Small manufacturers with limited resources can be prevented from marketing vehicles because of the high cost of quickly redesigning or retooling to comply with new safety standards. Thus, it is proposed in this amendment that provisions for granting limited and carefully controlled exemptions from specific requirements be provided for manufacturers and commercial importers, while not permitting degradation of the overall safety performance of the vehicles in question.

Currently the maximum penalty for violation of the notice of defect requirements of the act by a corporation is $10,000. In contrast to this, a manufacturer or importer who fails to comply with the safety standards is liable to a fine not exceeding $200,000 upon conviction on indictment. Thus, to be more consistent with other penalties under the act, and in similar federal statutes, it is proposed that a maximum fine of $100,000 be established for failure to comply with the notice of defect requirements.

It should be restated that the Motor Vehicle Safety Act has been effective in its current form in significantly improving motor vehicle safety at a reasonable cost. These improvements in safety have been and will continue to be in accordance with the wishes and active co-operation of the public and the provincial governments. Further improvements in safety will require continued and frequent refinements of the regulations and safety standards in order to take advantage of advances in automotive safety engineering.

In the interests of public safety, continued vigilance will be necessary to ensure that industry complies with federal motor vehicle safety requirements, both according to the letter and the spirit of the law. Through Transport Canada's investigation of public complaints, accident investigations and compliance inspecting and testing of vehicles, manufacturers and importers and their vehicles will continue to be monitored to ensure their adequate response to questions of vehicle safety performance.

The proposed amendments will assist in the more effective administration of the act and the safety regulations with subsequent further improvements in road safety in Canada.

I could go on, if the Honourable Senator Asselin wants me to, and if he enjoys hearing my voice; otherwise I will thank you all very much for your kind attention.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Haig, debate adjourned.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1977

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 9, the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-53, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970 and other acts subsequent to 1970.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, we are having a marathon sitting tonight, but I will not add much to its length.

This bill represents a triumph in legislative co-operation. The members of Parliament of all parties join in supporting it. I think Senator Bourget will agree that they could not have done it in our day in the House of Commons. It is very agreeable to think of every party co-operating in putting through this legislation, which is a gathering up of all the anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial nature that could be found in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other acts subsequent to 1970. And it does a tremendous amount of good because it corrects these statutes now, in 1977, instead of waiting for the ten-year revision.

This is a unique vehicle of law reform because it considers a problem common to all systems of legislation, namely, minor inconsistencies and errors that crop up in the enactment of statutes, of which there are 400 to 500 currently in force at the federal level.

Assistance was sought from everyone: the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, the judges of the Federal Court of Canada, the judges of the provincial courts, all law societies, the Law Reform Commission, all members of the House of Commons and all senators. Every one of us was circularized, and this bill is the result. It is a marvellous exhibition, and one of which the House of Commons in particular can be proud, since it shows what a co-operative spirit can do in such important matters as the correction of statutes.

Senator Langlois very ably introduced the legislation here, and it does not require any further comment from me. I cannot see how there can be any opposition to it, because each one of these errors which has been corrected has had the unanimous support of everyone who took part in the deliberations of the standing committee, and of all members of the other house. Therefore, it is my respectful submission that on the return of Senator Langlois tomorrow, the bill should be given second reading without delay.

Senator Perrault: May I say, in the absence of Senator Langlois, the sponsor of the bill, that if honourable senators are inclined to give the bill second reading this evening, it will be my intention to move on his behalf that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, dated Thursday, June 9, 1977, recommending certain amendments to certain Rules of the Senate.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I move that the report be now adopted. We have had a lengthy sitting this evening, and therefore I shall not be long. I will not be so brash as to say that the proposed changes to our rules are simple, but I will say that they are uncomplicated. I should like to explain briefly why these changes are being recommended.

First, the Leader of the Government and his deputy, as well as the Leader of the Opposition and his deputy, have sometimes been frustrated in dealing with questions during the Question Period because we have had no system in the Senate similar to that of the House of Commons concerning written questions. Therefore, this matter was brought to the attention of the committee.

The committee discussed fully the meaning of the word "question". This led to certain other changes. For example, the definition of "inquiry" in rule 5(e) is reworded because there was confusion as to the meaning of "inquiry" as it related to "question". Secondly, the definition of "question" in rule 5(n) is amended as follows:

"(n) "question", except in respect of the question period and a question of privilege, means a proposal presented to the Senate or a committee thereof by the Speaker or chairman for consideration and disposal in some manner.

That removes a great deal of the uncertainty concerning the use of the word "question".

Following on that, we completely revised rule 20, which sets out the method of handling the Question Period, which separates oral questions from written questions.

That, following through on the definition of the word "question", led to rule 28, where the words "or other matter" were added to the word "question".

While discussing the question of privilege, the participation of the Speaker in debate was raised, and rule 42 was slightly amended to make quite clear what the Speaker should do in the event that he or she wished to participate in a debate. It separates the obvious right of the Speaker to speak in a debate from his or her inability to speak in a debate on a point of order or question of privilege on which he or she later has to rule.

The last proposed amendment is to rule 75, which deals with a senator having a pecuniary interest in any matter referred to committee. This is slightly reworded to make it clear that a senator who has a pecuniary interest, not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown, shall not sit on such committee. It goes on to say that any question arising in the committee relating to that pecuniary interest may be determined by the committee, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

Those are the matters contained in the report presented last Thursday, which I hope honourable senators will adopt.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I do not wish in any way to delay matters, but I wonder if, in relation to the changes to rule 20, Senator Molson would take a moment to indicate whether they restrict or enlarge the present rule with regard to asking questions of the Leader of the Government in the Senate?

Senator Molson: As amended, rule 20 would clarify the ability of honourable senators to ask questions. I do not think it limits this right in any sense. A question may be addressed to the Government Leader in the Senate if it is a question relating to public affairs; to a senator who is a minister of the Crown, if it is a question relating to his ministerial responsibility; or to the chairman of a committee, if it is a question relating to the activities of that committee. Those are the rights that we have, but they are now spelled out a little more clearly.

I do not think there is any other form of question that we should be allowed to ask. The rule does not, in any sense, preclude a senator, during the course of a debate, from asking a question for clarification. It has no bearing on that. This rule applies to the Question Period only.

Again, supplementary questions may be asked. That right exists now. It is made clear that if an oral question cannot be answered because details not immediately available are required, it may be taken as notice. That is spelled out. The rule goes on to say that debate is out of order on an oral question, but a brief explanation may be made by the senator who asks the question and by the senator who answers it.

The proposed rule 20B is:

A preamble to a question, whether it is asked orally or in writing, is out of order.

● (2320)

If it is desired to put a question, as described in the previous paragraph which I have just read, that is seeking statistical information or information that is not readily available, or if an answer in writing is required, then the question shall be sent to the Clerk of the Senate to be placed on the Order Paper until answered, and the reply to that question will be printed in the Debates of the Senate.

I think it really is a great advance in the matter of questions. The procedure is spelled out in detail. There is no limitation on what is presently in force, but I think this makes it much clearer.

As honourable senators will remember, the matter of whether a question can be answered immediately or whether it should be taken as notice, and what form it should be received in, has caused us some considerable debate and loss of time in the past, and I hope that this amendment will make it clear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the honourable senator for his very clear and full explanation.

Senator Austin: I should like to ask Senator Molson a question with respect to the proposed amendment to rule 75, particularly subsection (1). If an honourable senator whose subject of inquiry is referred to a special committee becomes a member of the committee, is it implied in the rule that he is a member of the committee only for so long as that matter is before the committee, or does he remain a member of the committee until he resigns from it or is transferred from it?

Senator Molson: The answer is that this deals only with special committees. Usually a matter referred to a special committee would be of peculiar interest, or perhaps the senator referring it would have a peculiar knowledge of the subject. For this reason it is proposed to do what could have been done, for example, when Senator Desruisseaux introduced the matter of the textile industry and moved that it be referred to a committee. It is suggested that such a senator should be invited to become a member of the committee if he so desires. I think it is a reasonable provision. In the case of Senator Desruisseaux, who introduced the very useful debate we had on the textile industry, it would have been completely suitable that he be put on the committee because he is extremely knowledgeable on the subject.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know I reflect the views of all members in this chamber when I extend thanks for the work done by Senator Molson and the members of his committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: The procedures and rules of this house are important to all of us. In my view, this is a good report, and certainly worthy of support and adoption.

Motion agreed to, and report adopted.

DATE OF COMING INTO FORCE OF RULES

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be permitted to make a supplementary motion. I move:

That the amendments to the Rules of the Senate contained in the report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders dated Thursday, 9th June, 1977, and adopted by the Senate this day, shall come into force on the first day of the next session of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONSIDERATION OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Second Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, when I adjourned this debate it was to give honourable senators an opportunity to participate further in the debate. However, as no honourable senator has indicated that he wishes to do so, I suggest that this report be considered debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 15, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Capital Budget of Air Canada for the year ending December 31, 1977, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1977-893, dated March 30, 1977, approving same.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978. I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 923.)

The Clerk Assistant (Reading): The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the estimates—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Everett moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE CHAMBER

TAKING OF PHOTOGRAPHS BY THE PUBLIC—NOTICE OF MOTION

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move:

That visitors to Parliament be permitted to take photographs of the interior of the Senate chamber, the Senate antechamber and the foyer of the Senate at all times during visiting hours, except during:

(a) a sitting of the Senate,

(b) the period of one hour immediately prior to a sitting of the Senate,

(c) the period of 15 minutes immediately following a sitting of the Senate, or

(d) any period when the Senate chamber is closed for maintenance purposes or is being used for such special meetings as may be authorized by the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: Leave for what? To discuss the matter today? You do not need leave for a notice of motion.

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to Senator Riley. Where would these photographs be taken from? Does he suggest that tourists could walk right into the centre of the Senate chamber and take photographs?

Senator Flynn: Order!

Senator Riley: No, they could not go beyond the bar.

Senator Ewasew: I want to know the answer to that before the motion proceeds.

Senator Grosart: It is not a motion. It is a notice of motion.

Senator Flynn: In any event, a notice of motion does not require leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it a notice of motion, senator?

Senator Riley: I was asking for leave to put the motion without giving notice of motion under that rule.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Grosart: No, no.

Senator Riley: Well, there is provision for it. In any event, I will present it as notice of motion then.

Senator Flynn: You can move your motion at the next sitting.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Forsey in his capacity as joint chairman of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. Since the debate on consideration of the second report of that committee ended last night, I was wondering whether it was the intention of the joint chairman to move the adoption of this report.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I think I shall have to take that question as notice.

ORGANIZED CRIME

PROPOSED JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether or not the government is considering asking for a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate to inquire into the activities of organized crime in Canada?

Senator Perrault: To my knowledge no such proposal is in the planning stage at the present time. However, I understand that the Minister of Justice is in active and continuing contact with the Attorneys General of a number of Canadian provinces to determine the most effective way of meeting the problem of organized crime in Canada.

I hope to present a fuller report to the chamber next week after receiving a report concerning certain contacts which have been made.

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. Since I understand that I appeared at one point in last Monday night's CBC program on organized crime, does the leader not think that it is very urgent to make a decision in this regard?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must admit that I did not see all the programs in their entirety. I do recall catching a fleeting glimpse of the distinguished Leader of the Opposition in the second program, and in no way did he appear to be implicated with any crime or with any other malfeasance in society.

Senator Flynn: I am glad of your appreciation of the situation, but I have heard of other reactions.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. I am wondering if he will offer the services of the Senate to join with the House of Commons, which seems to me might perform a more useful inquiry than a royal commission.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can inform members of this chamber that some months ago I raised with the Honourable the Minister of Justice and others the possibility of a parliamentary inquiry—possibly a Senate inquiry—into organized crime. I questioned the Minister of Justice about the possibility of having a joint committee. As a result of these representations to the Minister of Justice, various opinions were obtained and it was felt at that time that it would be more appropriate and effective to have inquiries into organized crime initiated at the provincial level, because of jurisdictional considerations and the inter-relationships between law enforcement forces in this country. It was felt that because our federal system is somewhat different from that of the United States, where federal investigations have gone forward, a national investigation of organized crime in this country could not be initiated as easily or productively.

The opinion given by the Department of Justice a few months ago, when this matter was raised with the Honourable the Minister, was that inquiries of this kind could be conducted more effectively at the provincial level. Having said that, perhaps the information which has been made public in recent days may well lead to a reconsideration; but I cannot report further at this time.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I am of the opinion that in some cases these CBC broadcasts suggest guilt by association. My concern, principally, is for a large, law-abiding community of over one million people of Italian background, which, because of 12 bad eggs, is made sensitive. I ask the leader if he also feels similar concern with regard to this smearing by association of these law-abiding citizens of Canada.

● (1410)

Senator Perrault: I agree with those honourable senators and others who have been concerned about the possibility of guilt by association, the possibility of smearing one ethnic community in our country, and the really unfair situation which on occasion can arise from the selective editing of certain films and tape recordings. There is a very real danger that such a process could do an injustice to innocent, law-abiding people, especially when the serious problem of organized crime is condensed into a three-hour program. I understand that protestations of innocence have been uttered by some of those who were mentioned or who appeared in the programs. Knowing the nature of political conventions, for example, when I saw the Leader of the Opposition appear in one film clip, together with two other members of the Conservative Party, I could readily understand such an event occurring at any party convention in this country, and those viewers who might assume from such a film excerpt that the Leader of the Opposition was involved thereby in any kind of way with any sort of wrongdoing could have drawn a very wrong conclusion. All of us who have been involved in the political process are familiar with the misunderstandings and problems which can arise as a result of being present on public occasions at which we may be photographed with people, some of whom we have never met or about whom we know nothing. I do not want to comment any further.

Senator Olson: May I ask the Leader of the Government if he can provide this chamber with a somewhat more detailed report of the extensive activities that the police are now undertaking to deal with this problem of organized crime? I understand that it would have to be done in such a way that it would not jeopardize any of the police investigations that are going on now.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will most certainly undertake to provide a detailed report of the kind suggested by the honourable senator. I think it would be in the interests of the country that further information of this kind should be given to the people by Parliament.

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, since you are talking about the various aspects of this film in which it was suggested by implication that there was an Irish mafia, a Jewish mafia, and then an indication that there was a French Canadian mafia, and obviously there is an Italian mafia, with every respect to my confrere Senator Rizzuto, who we know is not involved, may I draw the attention of honourable senators to the—

Hon. Senators: Order! Order!

Senator Ewasew: —fact that there is not one degree of evidence or any indication whatever about a Canadian Ukrainian mafia. It follows, then, that the Ukrainians are well respected citizens.

Senator Riley: You are doing your best to organize one.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Riley for the second reading of Bill C-36, to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, in order to follow the admonition of the Leader of the Government I will not detain this house for long. I do not want to inspire the suggestion that we sit tonight. I also want to indicate that this is a very important day for me. It happens to be the fifteenth anniversary of my being called to this place.

I regret exceedingly that I did not hear the Honourable Dan Riley explain the purposes of this bill, and I regret, too, that I did not have the same good fortune of having the Department of Transport prepare my speech. In any event, Senator Riley's explanation was ample in view of the fact that within one hour in the House of Commons this bill was given second reading, dealt with in Committee of the Whole, given third reading and was passed.

There was only one amendment made in the Commons. The definition of "motor vehicle" in the original bill included farm tractors, but in the amended bill which is before us the reference to farm tractors has been deleted. During discussion of the bill it was suggested that in the future manufacturers of farm vehicles install roll bars as standard equipment on tractors to help prevent fatal accidents which result when tractors roll over.

In moving second reading of the bill, the Minister of Transport pointed out that the motor vehicle safety law had emerged as the result of co-operative action on the part of the provincial governments and the federal government.

This bill comes to grips with only one part of motor vehicle safety, by seeking to impose a variety of requirements on manufacturers and others. The manufacturers have agreed to maintain these standards.

Honourable senators may have noticed in the press in the last six months that a number of automobiles of different manufacture, each of a certain year, have been recalled because of defects in brake-linings, carburetors, and steering mechanisms. All these cars have been recalled by the manufacturer at no charge to the owner.

I would point out that since the introduction of the Motor Vehicle Safety Act in 1971, the number of highway traffic deaths per 100 million vehicle miles has fallen from 6.7 to an estimated 4.7, a decrease of 30 per cent. It is to be hoped, of course, that the rate will continue to decrease.

There are three contributing factors to highway traffic accidents: the vehicle, the highway, and the driver. The bill sets forth certain standards that the vehicle manufacturers and the government have agreed to, but which may take a few years to implement.

Since the building of the trans-Canada highway a few years ago, certain standards of construction have been in effect in all sections of it. The provinces, too, have been following these standards in building their own roads—standards as to the number of lanes, the building of underpasses, overpasses, cloverleafs, and so on. In my province the highway is built above the level of the surrounding land, and as a result wind-blown snow just sweeps across it, except in places like Colfax where fences and trees prevent this from happening.

In my opinion the driver is the most common cause of vehicle accidents, whether it is because of lack of driving ability—which is a provincial responsibility—or whether he is mentally or physically incapable at the time of the accident. All provinces have greatly stiffened the penalty for offensive driving, especially in the case of a fatal accident. Just last weekend in Manitoba there was a head-on collision which caused four deaths. The highway was straight and there were no obstructions or anything like that alongside the road. We do not know the cause of that accident, but certainly in cases where drivers are impaired something drastic needs to be done. Admittedly, the courts have increased the penalties in such cases but, in my opinion, they need to be increased even more when a driver is impaired, and especially when death occurs in highway motor vehicle accidents resulting from the incapacity of a driver to handle his vehicle.

Following the government leader's suggestion to effect a speed-up of the activities of this house, I would recommend that we not refer this bill to committee. A good reason for not doing so is that it was thoroughly discussed in the other place last November as a private member's bill. In Committee of the Whole it was amended by removing farm tractors from the definition of "vehicle." I suggest it be read the second time today, and the third time at the next sitting.

Incidentally, another reason for not referring this bill to the Transport and Communications Committee is that that committee is rather busy at the moment and will be even busier later on. As a matter of interest, if I might digress for a moment, there is so much work in committee that I was asked if I would be willing to give up the committee room I had reserved for the meeting of the Transport and Communications Committee tomorrow. I was pressed into that by several senators on the government side, but I acceded quickly enough because I knew about two hours before that we were not having a meeting anyway. I say I acceded quickly enough but, on the other hand, I held back and made them come to me. In any event, I agreed to give up the room tomorrow because we will not be discussing the Maritime Code this week.

Finally, honourable senators, I would suggest, after the brilliant and exhaustive explanation of this bill by Senator Riley, and my small contribution, that the motion for second reading be adopted today, and that the bill be given third reading tomorrow.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Riley moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL UNITY

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada. (Honourable Senator McDonald).

Senator Petten: Stand.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, if I may speak instead of Senator McDonald, who is not here, I think I could complete what I want to say in about 15 minutes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I was very interested to hear what has been said on the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

Before expressing my views on the subject, I would first commend the honourable senators who joined us recently. What we have been getting from them augurs very well indeed for their future contributions. I would like to join every other senator in extending to them my best wishes for a long and fruitful career with us.

I congratulate first Senator Perrault, our government leader, for giving us the opportunity to discuss this matter here, and also the honourable senators who suggested ways of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada. I am in total agreement with Senator Carter's remarks on education, feeling as I do that I could restate them and perhaps amplify them in the context of the province of Quebec.

Once we are called to the Senate, whatever our avocation and qualifications, we must consider in a non-partisan way whatever is good for Canadian unity and Senate impartiality.

As members of the Senate, we are in some way the conscience of the Canadian nation in stressing regional aspirations it feels are justified in ensuring fair scrutiny of our Canadian legislation to make it more acceptable. This in my view is a major part of our role here. Of course we must examine in a non-partisan, objective way the diverse and often opposite social and economic aspirations of the various regions of Canada.

In my view, the Senate owes it to itself to entertain but transcendent considerations. In that process, it must adhere to and promote the Constitution, opposing any unconstitutional feature in the legislation before us. It must protect and, if needed, fight for each one of our Canadian minorities, because Canada in effect is a group of minorities rather than a majority with minorities. It must foster Canadian unity in each and every case for greater social and economic progress, both as a nation and as aspiring regions of Canada.

We are very much aware that the Senate can and must defend and uphold the individual or collective rights enjoyed by Canadians in each and every region of Canada. Since Confederation, the Senate has been doing a good job of discharging that mandate.

How then can we make our contribution more capable of effectively meeting the regional aspirations of Canada?

I would first stress that during the last 111 years we already have made a significant contribution to Canada's progress and the fulfillment of a number of regional aspirations of Canada which we felt were healthy and positive, while our small nation developed and reached the very first echelon of industrialized nations of the world, acquiring in a multiplicity of areas of status of world leadership well beyond our numerical or economic size.

Among all the nations of the world, we now rank sixth so far as gross national product is concerned. We have reached this position through a remarkable increase in our Canadian standard of living and by keeping our cost of living in check so that till recently, among industrialized countries, only Australia, Turkey, Ireland and England still had a cost of living lower than ours.

[English]

The aspirations of my province, Quebec, justified or not in the eyes of some, have been made well known to all quite constantly since Confederation, and increasingly more so in the last 50 years. I have noted in the last three decades more than 40 well known and well circulated books in French and English by serious authors, discussing and pleading for the consideration and realization of the special aspirations of Quebec.

We have had innumerable featured articles and an abundance of serious editorials by the thinkers of Quebec on their regional aspirations, and increasingly so over these last few years. We have heard repeated warnings from some of our men of state. We have had the strong political warnings of Jean Lesage, Daniel Johnson and others. We have even heard songs and serenades of these pleas. We have heard representations of these aspirations and listened to submissions of briefs without, in too many cases, really obtaining favourable answers to the problems.

I am not saying here that Quebec's aspirations were all justified and warranted, but many were, and all should have received more consideration before now. There was and is general common knowledge as to what was wanted and aspired to by Quebec.

I recited, in my speech of some months ago, what was wanted for Quebec by quoting from the books written by Daniel Johnson and the present Prime Minister of Quebec, René Lévesque. I need not repeat them today, and I need not appraise any of the points mentioned.

We knew about the plans to eliminate the teaching of Canadian history from educational programming, and of the banishment of the Canadian flag and the national anthem from every public school room of Quebec. We reacted too little to these, although I believe it was important that we did something about them. We permitted our Canadian patriotism to disintegrate and to become unimportant in our lives.

We are now witnessing an intensive subversive brain-washing in most Quebec public schools, colleges and universities. We have been made aware of a plan to lower the voting age for the coming referendum on the independence of Quebec to 16 years, and there has been no protest or discussion even though we know they are counting on intense brain-washing to increase the number of "yes" votes.

We know, but we speak softly, of the intense teaching of Marxism in the schools of my province. We are presently paying too little attention to the Quebec militants who are openly planning the mobilization and nationalization of the savings of every individual Quebecer against his or her will and in spite of the economic consequences. The choice of silence, the show of indifference, and the attitude of not wanting to be our brother's keeper, in dealing with these problems and certain of the aspirations of militant Quebecers, are wrong and harmful to both Quebec and Canada.

The initiative taken to consider here in the Senate what can now be done to serve more efficiently the regional aspirations of the members of Confederation is to be highly commended. It will be a great and most useful task to perform. I only hope it is not too late for Quebec. I believe this chamber can do much more by initiating discussions with regional aspirants from all parts of Canada, by making analyses of and inquiries about basic issues that have become of national importance and national consequence, and by preaching mutual acceptance, tolerance, and understanding, and national patriotism and pride, to Canadians who originate from so many parts of the world.

We can be a vehicle for vulcanizing important national issues and some of the constructive aspirations that are made known to us, by searching for truth, for avenues of understanding, and for common action in our Canadian undertakings and their consequences for the regions of Canada.

[Translation]

I believe as well that we should, as the Senate considers all regional aspirations, ensure that Canadian social and economic facts which we have initiated and developed directly or indirectly are clearly and universally understood. We should not let distorted concepts develop, since they cause distortions among our regional members or contribute to open areas of disagreement and division between our regions.

In addition to its proven outstanding experience in so many areas, the traditional wisdom and cautiousness of this chamber can enable the Senate to render now the most valuable services in the consideration of tomorrow's regional aspirations, in terms of strongly defending, I would say, the solidarity, the equality among all Canadians, working for a more productive common action of its members, and providing a renewed, warm and efficient patriotism everywhere in this country and in particular in all educational institutions, towards the achievement of mutually profitable progress.

On motion of Senator Croll, debate adjourned.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE INQUIRY

IMPLICATIONS ARISING FROM BERGER COMMISSION REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Ernest C. Manning rose pursuant to notice of June 1:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to certain implications for Canada arising from the Berger Commission Report.

He said: Honourable senators, we are all aware that the government must shortly make an important decision regarding a natural gas pipeline from the Canadian Arctic to augment declining energy reserves and meet future national requirements, especially in the heavily populated and highly industrialized areas of central Canada. The Berger Commission report undoubtedly will figure prominently in deliberations leading to the government's decision. Since the report was released, Mr. Justice Berger's findings and recommendations have been widely publicized as infallible gospel, and the impression is being created that what he has said should be accepted as the factual data base against which all contrary evidence and conclusions regarding a northern pipeline should be assessed. I, for one, reject that proposition as unjustified and unwarranted. My purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate is to point out some very questionable conclusions in the Berger report, and particularly to emphasize the serious implications for Canada if his recommendations are made the basis for the important decision the government must make.

Let me acknowledge at the outset that the report does contain much valuable information pertaining to the social and environmental concerns of the native people living in the Yukon and northwest Arctic regions. Most certainly it will be a very useful and valuable textbook for sociologists and environmentalists. It will also be the most costly. The commission's expenses were $3,200,000. Another $1.2 million of public funds was given to four native groups, and used to oppose the early construction of a northern pipeline. An additional $540,000 was given to environmentalists to argue and formally record their opposition to the construction of any pipeline across the Arctic tundra. Many more thousands of dollars were spent by the CBC, who had camera crews trailing the commission throughout its travels to practically every little community in the Mackenzie Valley and the western Arctic, giving national coverage and national status to the endless repetition of often illogical opposition to the pipeline by local spokesmen in each tiny community. All in all, the inquiry and the report cost the Canadian taxpayers well over $5 million.

If giving the maximum number of native people an opportunity to be heard in the production of a textbook for sociologists, environmentalists and students of northern minority interests, without regard to cost, was Mr. Justice Berger's objective, he certainly succeeded. However, if the report is assessed from the extent to which it comes to grips, in a meaningful way, with the fundamental question of Canada's national need to augment declining energy reserves with Arctic gas, its value is almost nil.

To be fair to Mr. Justice Berger, he does say that Canadians must decide if the need for Arctic gas is sufficiently important to override the adverse effects he envisaged a pipeline having on the northern communities; but his own recommendations show clearly that he has not weighed the relative importance or magnitude of the national versus the local interests, or given any serious attention to the social as well as the physical impact the developing world energy crisis will have on all industrialized nations, including Canada.

Like millions of other Canadians, including many in high places, Mr. Justice Berger obviously does not believe that any serious energy problem is developing in this country, and so he concerned himself almost exclusively with the interests and fears, both real and imaginary, of a tiny minority of local residents, and ignored the broader more vital issue that will affect the standard of living and the way of life of not a few thousand, but of many millions of Canadian citizens.

In assessing our national energy situation we should look at oil and natural gas as component parts of our major source of energy, namely, hydrocarbon fuels, which presently supply approximately 75 per cent of the energy requirements in both Canada and the United States. Exploration for oil often leads to the discovery of gas, and vice versa. One cannot be divorced from the other. While the current pipeline debate centres on transporting gas, the outlet to markets for Arctic gas most certainly will contribute significantly to the development of additional supplies of northern oil.

Let us now turn our attention to a few highlights of the developing energy crisis. The simple fact is that the industrialized nations are now using up the world's known supplies of hydrocarbon fuels faster than new sources of supply are being discovered. There is an accumulating mass of evidence that not only North America but the entire industrialized world is approaching an energy crisis. At a recent 60-nation conference on nuclear energy, Dr. Sigrard Eckland, Director of the Atomic Energy Agency, warned that the world is reaching the beginning of the end of the use of naturally occurring hydrocarbon fuels, which now account for about two-thirds of our energy consumption. "The world," he said, "is rapidly running out of traditional sources of energy."

President Carter, in presenting his energy conservation program to Congress, pointed out that if world demand for oil continued to increase during the 1980s at the present rate of 5 per cent a year, the world's present proven oil reserves would be used up by the year 2000. A United Press despatch out of Washington, dated June 1, quotes a new United States congressional staff report as saying the energy crisis is so serious that:

—it contains the seeds of depression, revolution and war. Some energy experts, far from doubting the reality of the energy crisis, consider the situation even more serious than recent private reports have suggested. There have been several analyses recently that suggest world oil demand will outgrow supply by the early 1980s, creating international tensions but the new report said energy producers and users consulted by the Office of Technology Assessment have made the most sobering analysis yet of the gravity of the energy crisis.

Knowledgeable sources within the industry expect mid-East oil production to peak by the end of the 1980s. Because energy is the economic lifeblood of an industrialized society, all industrialized nations face a common problem, but there are at least two reasons why the developing situation is particularly serious for the United States and Canada. In the first place, we use more energy per capita than other nations. Canadians, in fact, use more energy per capita than any other nation on earth.

In the second place, the greater part of the world's present major oil reserves is controlled by the OPEC nations of the Middle East and the Soviet Union and her satellites, who have no inclination to help preserve the economic and industrial strength of the western democracies. In the past three years the OPEC bloc has exploited its monopoly to increase the cost of oil to importing nations by more than 300 per cent, from $3.50 to over $11 per barrel.

Now let us look specifically at our situation here in Canada. We are one of the more fortunate nations, because we still have significant reserves and the potential to develop more; but that does not mean that we will not face a serious energy problem in the years ahead. The year 1975 marked the end of an era in Canada's economic history in that in 1975 we lost our self-sufficiency in oil. In 1974 the value of oil exports exceeded the cost of oil imported by $761 million. In 1975 oil imported exceeded the value of oil exported by $247 million, a turn-around of $1 billion in our export-import oil trade balance in the space of one year.

We have thus far been spared an overall energy trade deficit by reason of our export of natural gas, but this situation will not continue indefinitely, unless our proven resources of gas can be significantly increased. No new applications to increase natural gas exports have been approved by the National Energy Board in the past four years, while from here on our imports of crude oil will continue to increase. Canada's energy minister has stated that unless we are able to change present trends, we will require net imports of oil to meet between 40 and 50 per cent of our domestic requirements by 1985. That is only eight years in the future. The National Energy Board's latest report forecasts imports of 450,000 barrels per day by 1985, increasing to 600,000 barrels or more by 1990. Based on these forecasts, and at projected world oil prices, the cost to Canada of imported oil will reach $2.8 billion by 1985, and over $3.7 billion by 1990. Government forecasts place Canada's total energy requirements by 1990 in excess of 14 quadrillion BTUs, which is two-thirds greater than our present consumption, with domestic supplies falling short of meeting that demand by 40 per cent. Ontario Hydro alone has forecast a four million kilowatt shortfall in its supply of electric energy by the 1980s.

While there may be a discrepancy of a few million barrels or billion BTUs in the various consumption forecasts, or a few years either way in the time when the real crunch will come, the evidence is overwhelming that Canada in the relatively near future will face a very real and serious energy crisis unless major steps are taken now to avert or at least minimize its impact.

It is true our natural gas reserves in western Canada are still extensive, and more are being found. In fact Alberta has a considerable shut-in supply at the present time but two things should be kept in mind: first, our gas reserves are not adequate to permit a sufficient increase in gas exports to continue to offset the steadily increasing volumes of oil we must import at world prices; and second, our gas reserves currently are located largely in one province—Alberta. As those reserves decline, Alberta naturally will protect its own consumers by reducing the volumes of gas it approves for markets outside the province. While any responsible provincial government faced with the same circumstances would do the same thing, such action would create the same resentments and tensions within this country as are already feared between nations as they each strive to protect their own interests in the face of an overall inadequate world oil supply. Such resentments have already been aroused by Alberta's insistence on a domestic price for its oil more in line with what it could obtain on the world market. Such conflict of interests between the provinces of Canada could in the future place very severe strains on the ties of Confederation which certainly are not in a condition to absorb them.

What all this adds up to is that in the national interest, Canada must, without further delay, take meaningful steps to conserve its diminishing energy supplies and do everything possible to develop new sources of supply of both oil and natural gas.

Three main possible sources of new supplies are available to us. One is offshore development. So far, offshore drilling on both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts has proven disappointing. Little oil has been found. Drilling costs are very high, and development has been hampered by environmental extremists and the fears of coastal pollution on the part of communities adjacent to the offshore drilling sites.

A second is the Athabasca tar sands. This may rightly be called Canada's energy ace in the hole. It is one of the world's largest known oil reserves, but the cost of development is very high. The present Syncrude plant will cost over $2 billion, and will produce only 125,000 barrels of crude oil per day. It would require five such plants, at a cost of $12 billion to $15 billion, to provide the 600,000 barrels of oil per day which the National Energy Board predicts Canada will have to import by 1990. The time required for the construction of even one such plant is four to seven years.

A third source of potential oil and gas supply is the Canadian Arctic—the Mackenzie Delta, the Arctic islands and the Beaufort Sea. Here again, development costs are high and conditions are difficult. Results to date have not been too encouraging, but they have been sufficient to establish that given a set of circumstances that will encourage development, the potential is high. The president of Pan Arctic Oils Limited—the joint government-private consortium—maintains that the potential gas reserves in the Arctic islands is in excess of 100 trillion cubic feet. Some forecasts indicate that on the basis of known reserves, Mackenzie Delta gas could displace $17 billion of imported oil at current prices or $25 billion at projected 1985 prices over a 20-year period.

Two things are certain: First, Canada must look to the Arctic for much of its future gas and oil requirements; second, extensive oil and gas exploration and development in the Canadian Arctic will not take place unless circumstances are conducive to development, and one of the essential requisites is a pipeline to move gas to market. No developer can long afford to go on drilling wells at $4 to $6 million per hole, only to cap them if gas or oil is discovered. At least two major companies have recently announced they are terminating their drilling operations until the government clarifies the situation regarding a pipeline and government regulations as they will apply to future northern development.

One big factor in insuring the economic viability of a gas pipeline and substantially reducing transmission costs is the opportunity Canada presently has to combine the movement of Canadian Arctic gas with United States gas from the north slope of Alaska. Maximum throughput is the key to minimum transmission cost per Mcf and it will be a colossal blunder on Canada's part if, through procrastination and indecision, or the irrational anti-American criticism of negative nationalists, we miss the opportunity to gain a significant economic advantage for Canadian consumers by pooling the transmission of Canadian and American Arctic gas. We are already precariously close to losing this opportunity.

In the light of these considerations and Canada's developing energy crisis, four positive steps already are overdue. First, we are already at least two years late in implementing a meaningful national energy conservation program. We are currently wasting more energy than any other nation, and yet nobody, least of all government, seems to really care or to grasp the seriousness of a national indifference to the almost criminal waste of our irreplaceable energy resources.

Second, there is urgent need for a realistic and effective program to encourage increased exploration for oil and gas and increased development of proven areas. Primarily, this means a major revision of taxation and royalty laws and regulations by both the federal and the provincial governments. The present shortsighted excessive taxation of resource industries is something this country can no longer afford, when we weigh the ultimate cost to the Canadian people against the temporary revenue gains of the present.

Third, there is urgent need for a meaningful national program to develop new sources of energy: nuclear, solar, geothermal, tidal—the whole gamut. This is a necessity if we are to protect our future as an industrial nation. Nevertheless, nothing of any real significance is being done in that regard.

Finally, we should move without further delay to tie our existing and potential sources of hydrocarbon fuels into a national delivery system. Canada's energy crunch, when it comes, will hit hardest in central Canada. The western provinces will have local sources of oil and gas long after central Canada has faced serious shortages. The maritimes can at least draw more easily and economically on offshore sources. Not only is central Canada the farthest away geographically from major sources of supply but, with her large population and highly industrialized economy, her fuel requirements are by far the largest of any region of Canada. For that reason we need to tie the vast gas potential of the Canadian Arctic into the existing national delivery system, not for Alberta's sake or for the benefit of the United States but primarily to help ensure the future energy needs of central Canada.

We have reached the point where time is of the essence. In fact, a northern pipe line should have been under construction at least two years ago when the cost would have been millions of dollars less than it is today. Each month's delay adds further millions to the ultimate cost, which in the end will be borne by the consumers. That the Berger Commission report could result in still further delay is one of its most serious implications from the standpoint of Canada's national interests.

As guardians of those national interests, who can to some extent influence the government's decision, may I direct your attention to four assumptions in the report that can and should be successfully challenged.

The first is the assumption that the proposed line cannot be built without causing serious permanent damage to the physical environment. Such an assumption ignores the expertise and capabilities of modern technology. Surely, if we can send men and equipment to the moon and back, if we can put television cameras and a miniature laboratory on Mars with the capability of scooping up and analysing soil samples and relaying the findings 230 million miles back to Earth—surely, if we can do all these things, we are capable of laying a pipeline through the Arctic wastelands without doing irreparable damage to the physical environment.

Many people forget that over 30 years ago the 600-mile Canol Oil Pipeline was built from Norman Wells to Whitehorse over some of the most difficult terrain in the Canadian north, with very little, if any, lasting damage to the environment. The whole project was undertaken and quickly completed as a war emergency measure, with none of the furore or obstruction now being encountered when a pipeline of even greater importance is proposed to meet a national peacetime need.

The second assumption is that the pipeline cannot be built without causing serious damage to native cultures and their way of life. Rejecting or deferring the pipeline will not stop the impact which a growing knowledge of the outside world will increasingly have on northern lifestyles. Not many in the far north who have discovered the advantages of snowmobiles any longer prefer dog teams. The native population is by no means unanimous in rejecting the advantages of controlled development. During the construction period, the presence of outside workmen will have a disruptive effect on communities immediately adjacent to the pipeline right-of-way, but that period will be short and with proper supervision, which should be guaranteed, the disruption can be kept to a minimum. The problems created in sparsely-settled northern areas will be different, but not necessarily more disruptive than when construction is through highly-developed, heavily-populated communities. It is interesting that the state of Alaska, which has had the experience of a major oil pipeline being built under similar conditions, is vigorously pressing to have another pipeline built across Alaska to carry north slope gas to the Pacific seaboard.

The third assumption is that a ten-year delay will enable the native people to prepare for the impact which the pipeline will have on their way of life and give them time to settle land claims before the line is built. I submit that a ten-year delay will not result in any meaningful preparation. People do not adjust to new circumstances until such circumstances arise. It is actually the facing up to the new conditions which brings about that adjustment. The ten-year period would be primarily a time of consolidation of entrenched opposition to the pipeline, and would be used by self-appointed champions of native rights to exploit their fears and to encourage their resistance. This would create an atmosphere far from conducive to the voluntary settlement of land claims. For that reason it is unrealistic to suggest that a ten-year delay would lead to satisfactory settlements. At the end of the ten-year period practically all of the present problems will still exist and some new ones will have been added.

This is an area in which the Berger report is extremely unfair to the native population. It is little short of cruel to build up in their minds false hopes and unrealistic expectations which cannot be fulfilled; and yet that is precisely what the inquiry and the report have done. The long-range consequences, when disillusionment sets in, may well be more damaging to the native peoples' relationships with the rest of Canada than the damage which Justice Berger fears from the pipeline being built. Should this prove to be the case, it would have been better had the commission never been set up.

Finally, there is the commission's acceptance of the premise that the interests and local concerns of the small body of native residents should properly take priority over the national interest and the legitimate concerns of millions of Canadians who may be far more seriously hurt by a future shortfall in Canada's energy supply. This is not to suggest that the rights and concerns of the native minority should be ignored or treated lightly. Far from it. But the majority also has rights, and minority interests cannot be permitted to negate those rights and be accepted by the government as grounds to ignore the serious consequences the majority would suffer as a result. To argue otherwise is unsound, unfair and certainly undemocratic. Many will agree that there is need to rethink this whole issue of minority versus majority rights. At the present time there is in Canada a pronounced tendency to give minority interests priority over the rights and interests of the majority. It has been well said that if you want your interests defended today, be sure to identify yourself with a minority group. What happened at the Berger inquiry gives credence to such cynicism.

• (1510)

The population of the Yukon and Northwest Territories is approximately 60,000. Assuming one half of them could possibly be affected by the pipeline, we are talking about 30,000 people. In central Canada there are over 14.5 million. Assuming that the livelihood and way of life of only half of them would be seriously affected by a gas shortage, we are talking about over 7 million people. The 30,000 in the north were given $40 per capita to present their concerns to the commission. Comparable treatment for the over 7 million in central Canada would have meant a grant of over $280,000,000 which, of course, is ridiculous.

The fact remains that very little attention was given by the commission to making certain that it gained a full knowledge of the legitimate concerns of the majority of Canadians whose interests would be materially affected by its recommendations.

The presentation of their case was left primarily to the applicants who want to build the pipeline, and they were treated as self-interest groups and profit seekers by the media and those opposing the project, and, at times, even the commission itself. So much so, that the president of Canadian Arctic Gas Pipelines on one occasion was moved to say to the commissioner, "I must say that there are times when it hurts, frankly, to be branded as profiteers with no conscience."

There remains one other matter of increasing importance that was underscored by the Berger Commission hearings. That is the need to develop a better method of determining legitimate environmental concerns. It is imperative that such concerns be taken fully into account, but the present procedures are obviously unsatisfactory and are becoming more and more unworkable.

The practice of an open-door policy at public inquiries, that permits every qualified and unqualified guardian of the environment to present his opinion, leads to endless repetition with no means of screening pertinent from inaccurate and valueless material. Almost every public inquiry and regulatory tribunal today faces prolonged delays in completing its assignments because of such endless and often meaningless repetition. The cost of such delay is very high and, as always, the consumer pays the bill.

I do not know what the answer is, but certainly it is important that one be found. It may be that consideration should be given to regional government environmental centres to which all environmental concerns could be expressed by all interested parties. Perhaps the centres could then be responsible for analyzing and co-ordinating the material provided, and separating the wheat from the chaff. One or more qualified environmentalists from the centres could then be a single authority to present environmental information before any commission or regulatory body dealing with a matter to which such information was pertinent. Perhaps others can produce a better suggestion, and, if so, I hope they will.

Honourable senators, I have tried to outline what I believe are the major public concerns related to and arising out of the subject matter of the Berger Report. I have tried, I hope fairly, to point out the basic deficiencies in the report and the reasons why I hope the government will not be unduly influenced by Mr. Justice Berger's conclusions in making its important and long overdue decision regarding a northern gas pipeline.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I had thought that I might clarify one or two points in Senator Manning's remarks by asking questions. However, on reflection, I would like to reply to Senator Manning at somewhat greater length than I am prepared for this afternoon.

Although I shall be in Toronto next week with the European parliamentary group and shall not be able to participate in the debate until the following week, I would ask the indulgence of honourable senators to permit me to adjourn the debate.

Senator Rowe: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Does that mean there will be no opportunity in the interim for any other honourable senator to participate in the debate?

Senator van Roggen: I would suggest honourable senators might speak on this subject matter during my absence if, at an appropriate time, one would be kind enough to adjourn the debate in my name.

On motion of Senator van Roggen, debate adjourned.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Orville H. Phillips rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the record levels of unemployment in Canada and the failure of the government to adequately deal with the problem.

He said: Honourable senators, during the first few months of this year we have been experiencing our highest level of unemployment since we began keeping records on unemployment. Over one million Canadians are looking for work, with very little prospect of obtaining employment.

This is a grim situation, by any standard the government chooses to use, yet we hear very little about the subject of unemployment in this chamber or in the media, and, in fact, at times I almost think there is a conspiracy of silence with respect to it. The government and the media are silent, diverting attention to the subject of national unity. The unemployed are cast aside, banished, forgotten, for the discussion on national unity and the problems of the division of language.

The Prime Minister is the chief of those who advocate the diversion of attention from the unemployed to more mystical subjects such as national unity. It is far easier, honourable senators, and more popular, to be a champion of national unity than a champion of the unemployed.

The Prime Minister found it easy to talk of unity in Washington and of unemployment in London, but for some strange reason he has neglected to make a major effort to deal with either subject in this Parliament. The Prime Minister discusses the sensitive subject of unemployment at the Downing Street conference, but he avoids discussion of the subject with Parliament or, indeed, with the more than one million unemployed Canadians. This is a subject that cannot be cast aside by creating the idea that unemployment is the fault of those that are unemployed, or that it is the fault of the provinces, or that it is the fault of private industry.

Honourable senators, we must remember that the unemployed were not the ones who were living beyond their means. It is time this government forgot the performances of past governments, regardless of their political allegiance, and began to deal with the present problem—the problem of this government, the problem of over one million unemployed.

Recently the Leader of the Government was kind enough to answer an inquiry standing in my name. The information received is most interesting. It tells us that 1,377,000 Canadians were registered for employment at a time when the government gave the seasonally adjusted unemployment figure as 870,000 Canadians. This leaves a slight difference of 507,000 Canadians unaccounted for. I presume that this generation of Liberals is saying, "What's a half-million unemployed? Quit counting at less than a million."

The method of calculating the number of unemployed has often been criticized. Presently, the rate of unemployment is measured as the number of persons in the labour force who do not have jobs. However, the criteria used by Statistics Canada eliminates thousands from the survey. To be included in the survey as unemployed an individual must present proof of an active search for work during the survey period. This is often an exercise in futility. In a small town, dependent on one industry, the unemployed know whether or not a job is available. Is it worthwhile getting up at 7 o'clock in the morning and peering in at the gates looking for employment? After a while they get discouraged. If an unemployed person works at any part-time employment such as shovelling snow or mowing a lawn during the survey period, he or she is classified as being employed. Even one hour of gainful employment in that survey period removes the individual from the unemployment classification. We in this chamber are often criticized for not being too productive, but I think that even we would admit that at a rate of one hour's work in two weeks, we would be unemployed.

Senator Perrault was unduly sensitive when I mentioned the difference between the number of persons registered for work at Manpower and those drawing unemployment insurance, and he pointed out that there are various methods of calculating the number of unemployed, but, honourable senators, surely the unemployed do not have to have an invitation to be considered in the statistics on unemployment. In Nova Scotia this winter there were more persons drawing unemployment insurance benefits than the government listed as unemployed. As a matter of fact, it was a great joke in Nova Scotia to meet your friend or neighbour and say, "It's a nice day if you don't seasonally adjust it." I do not think the unemployed should have to go through this type of statistical analysis to have the government recognize their serious situation.

Recently the Cape Breton Post printed an article criticizing the method used by Statistics Canada to determine the unemployment rate. It pointed out that 14,476 persons were drawing unemployment insurance benefits in Cape Breton. This number did not include those who were ill, those who had part-time employment or, as I say, those who did not receive an invitation. Statistics Canada reported the unemployment rate in Cape Breton as 16.2 per cent and, honourable senators, they reported this despite the fact that the 14,476 persons drawing benefits represent 25.6 per cent of the work force in Cape Breton. If those who were not invited to participate in the unemployment statistics were included, the actual unemployment rate would be approximately 30 per cent. The very least this government can do is to extend an invitation to the unemployed to be included in their statistics. They seem to be doing very little else. Surely they can send them such an invitation.

Honourable senators, I am aware that different methods can be used in calculating the number of unemployed. However, I believe it is time that we began to have an accurate system. Surely, with the present computer science technology we can develop a more accurate and more consistent figure than we presently have. I may say here that I do not accept the recent figures released by Statistics Canada on unemployment. I am not convinced, with the university students coming into the work force at the end of the academic year, that the number of unemployed has declined. The university students were probably excluded for the simple reason that most of them finished their university exams around the end of the month, and therefore, being unable to present proof of having searched for employment each day, they were not included. I am sure no one in this chamber—indeed, no one in either chamber of Parliament—expects a university student to go to employers at examination time, seek interviews for employment, and then persuade an individual employer to sign a statement that he or she has been seeking employment. That is not a natural way to proceed.

When we consider unemployment, we must also consider various regions of Canada. This is an unfortunate fact, but one we must bear in mind. I would now like to state a few basic figures and I hope that honourable senators opposite will relay them to the cabinet and, indeed, to their caucus. First of all, there are approximately 150,000 more Canadians unemployed now than there were at this time last year, and this despite the fact that the number of Canadians entering the work force has declined. We have had a decrease in the number entering the work force and an increase in unemployment. Put those two statistics on a graph, honourable senators, and they will cause you some concern.

Unemployment statistics are divided into age groups. Forty-eight per cent of those in the age group from 15 to 25 years of age are unemployed. That number does not include the university graduates and high school students who will now be looking for summer employment.

Naturally, I am concerned about unemployment in the Atlantic region. In 1970, the unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces was at the same level as the rest of Canada. Today, in 1977, the unemployment rate in the four Atlantic provinces is 50 per cent higher than it was in 1970. I ask those honourable senators who support this government if they can honestly consider that they have made progress?

Let us now consider the effect and cost of unemployment. It has been stated that this record unemployment costs $2 billion annually in welfare and unemployment insurance benefits, $6 billion in loss of production, and $1 billion in loss of tax revenues. In more personal terms, this means a loss of $2,000 yearly to every Canadian taxpayer. Aside from the personal aspect, Canada cannot afford to have this staggering number of Canadians looking for work; neither can we afford the social and mental attitudes that develop from unemployment. We must consider the adverse effects upon our youths. Forty-eight per cent of our unemployment embraces those who are under 25 years of age. It is in this age group that attitudes towards life are developed. The attitude and opinions developed at that age remain with us throughout our lives. In this chamber I have often heard honourable senators refer to the "old-fashioned work ethic". It is difficult for a half million unemployed young people to develop an attitude towards work when they cannot obtain employment. You cannot develop a taste for caviar by reading about it; you have to eat caviar several times to develop a taste. Yet, today's youth are spending time in high school, community colleges and universities to prepare themselves for what they hope will be an opportunity to work. We must ensure that they have an opportunity to obtain employment.

On November 15 last, I watched the Quebec provincial election returns on television, and was impressed by the number of young people at the Paul Sauvé Arena. My first reaction was that the PQ had indoctrinated the young people of Quebec. Then I realized that half of those young people there—probably more than half—were unemployed. I thought, "Small wonder René Levesque is reaping such a harvest." It is unnecessary for me to point out to you that the PQ have now indoctrinated these young people with their ideas on separatism, and it takes a long time to de-program a young person. It takes a lot of effort. I wonder if we have the time.

In addition to that, honourable senators, I point out that the unemployed youth of other provinces are very susceptible to radical ideas. The prospects for university graduates this year are even worse than those of last year. About half of last year's university graduates obtained employment. Apparently the Prime Minister does not consider that a problem, because he says to the unemployed university graduates, "If you can't get employment in Canada, go to the Third World." It must be extremely frustrating for a recent university graduate, after spending a number of years preparing himself in a speciality, to find he is unable to obtain employment. But it is even more frustrating for a university graduate to apply for a job, whether it be in the public service or private industry, and be told that he is over-qualified for that job. I find it strange, honourable senators, that a university graduate should be over-qualified for employment in a technical nation such as Canada, but not over-qualified in the Third World.

One factor which must be considered is the discouragement and despair of those who have been unemployed for some time. Fifty per cent of those unemployed today have been unemployed for four months or longer. It is difficult to place ourselves in the situation of these persons and understand their feelings.

I know honourable senators are prepared at this stage to ask, "Well, what would you do about it?" I recall, when I was a member of the other house, that the then prime minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, announced that Mr. McCutcheon—the late Senator McCutcheon—was being given the task of implementing the recommendations of the Glassco Commission. While Mr. Pearson, the Leader of the Opposition, was replying and emphasizing the qualifications and experience of Mr. McCutcheon, an unidentified Grit spoke up and said, "Yes, but he always begins by changing the board of directors." Honourable senators, that is my first recommendation. We should begin by changing the board of directors.

Our economic situation must be considered if we are to understand our unemployment picture. Our balance of payments problem is as serious as that of any of the western nations. Our competitive position in the export markets continues to decline, even though our dollar has been freed and devalued. Our exports continue to consist mainly of raw material and unprocessed goods. Canada has 32,000 manufacturing firms, but only 1,000 of them are actively engaged in exporting their products. That fact alone suggests that we need another drive to increase our exports. Our manufacturing firms can only export when they have an opportunity to be competitive with foreign firms.

Forty-three per cent of the GNP of Canada is consumed by various levels of government. We now spend a higher proportion of our taxation revenues on government services than any other government of the western world. We have so conditioned Canadians to believe that only big government can spend their money wisely that it will take time to demonstrate to them that reasonable financial control can be exercised by a government and still result in an expanding economy.

Sixty per cent of our employment is provided by small firms. We must make tax concessions, provide research and development assistance and management courses to assist our small business firms. We must also make an effort to control the adverse effect on employment of high interest rates and increasing prices of oil and electricity.

As a result of the high cost of living there has been an increase in the number of women entering the work force. Many of these people do not wish to have full-time employment; rather, they wish to have an income to assist in the expenses at home. They would be quite content with part-time work. Canada, however, does not provide an opportunity for such people to work part time. The government, one of our largest sources of employment, makes no provision for part-time employment.

Honourable senators, I could go on and mention that many of our unionized workers are forced to work overtime, despite their protests, and I could ask: Why not use the unemployed for over-time work?

My remarks would not be complete if I did not make some reference to the lack of government action to deal with the present drastic unemployment situation. My remarks in this regard will be brief. They have to be brief, because the government has not done much to deal with the problem.

Last fall the government re-initiated two programs which it had eliminated as an economy measure. Today, several months later, the government has been unable to allocate or spend the money provided for the Canada Works and the Young Canada Works programs.

It was expected that the last budget would introduce measures to deal with unemployment. Hundreds of thousands of unemployed looked forward to that budget—an unusual event in Canada, but they did look forward to the budget in the hope that it would contain some relief for them. Out of the total budget, only $100 million was set aside for the unemployed. Honourable senators, that comes to approximately $1.50 per week for each unemployed person, which is not enough to provide bus fare to enable him to seek work.

Honourable senators, if we are to be fair to all Canadians we must provide better opportunities for those who are unemployed, and we must recognize that unemployment is not the fault of the unemployed. I know many unemployed persons who would be willing to work if they were given the opportunity. Let us attempt to give them that opportunity.

On motion of Senator Croll, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE ON THE ESTIMATES LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1978

WEDNESDAY, June 15, 1977

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, February 17, 1977, examined the said Estimates and reports as follows:

1. The Committee was authorized by the Senate, as recorded in the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of February 17, 1977, "to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, in advance of bills based upon the said Estimates reaching the Senate."

2. In obedience to the foregoing, the Committee made a general examination of the Estimates and heard evidence from the Honourable Robert Andras, President of Treasury Board, Mr. R. L. Richardson, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch, Treasury Board, and Mr. E. A. Radburn, Director, Estimates Division, Program Branch, Treasury Board.

The Committee is continuing its detailed examination of the Department of Public Works and expects to conclude its extensive hearings on this department with the appearance of the Minister of Public Works on June 28 after which the Committee will commence the preparation of its report.

3. The Main Estimates for 1977-78 in total amount to $44,582 million. Budgetary Estimates account for $41,145 million and non-budgetary estimates (loans investments and advances) account for $3,437 million. These categories may be further subdivided into statutory and non statutory. Statutory non-budgetary requirements in the amount of $2,434 million are included in these 1977-78 estimates for the first time. Other statutory payments make up 55.7% of the total budgetary payments, in dollars $22,934 million. The remainder of the budgetary estimates, $18,211 million, represents funds for which Parliament is asked to provide new authority. The following table summarizes this breakdown of the Main Estimates.

Budgetary and Non-Budgetary Main Estimates
By Type of Authority 1977-78 ($ millions)

Expenditure Authority	Budgetary	Non-Budgetary	Total
Statutory	22,934 55.7%	2,434 70.8%	25,368 56.9%
Non-Statutory	18,211 44.3%	1,003 29.2%	19,214 43.1%
Total	41,145 100%	3,437 100%	44,582 100%

4. The Committee noted that over the last seven years the budgetary estimates for statutory payments have been consistently over 50% as shown in the following table:

Percentage of Statutory Payments in Main Budgetary Estimates

Fiscal Year	Total Main Budgetary Estimates	Voted	Statutory	Percentage of Statutory
1970-1971	14,817.0	6,587.3	8,229.7	55.5
1971-1972	16,557.5	7,261.0	9,296.5	55.2
1972-1973	18,273.6	8,108.9	10,164.7	55.6
1973-1974	21,427.6	9,213.0	12,214.6	57.0
1974-1975	25,467.4	10,478.4	14,989.0	58.9
1975-1976	32,210.6	14,335.3	17,875.3	55.5
1976-1977	38,417.1	16,570.5	21,846.6	59.5
1977-1978	41,144.9	18,211.1	22,933.8	55.7

5. The President of the Treasury Board told the Committee that it is the Government's intention to hold the percentage growth in expenditures to the general trend of the increase in the Gross National Product. This objective has been repeatedly stressed by the Committee which is pleased to note that if the expenditures for 1976-77 are held to the current forecast the percentage increase will be less than the Gross National Product change for the calendar year 1976.

The President of the Treasury Board provided the Committee with a chart showing the growth in public expenditures in relation to the Gross National Product over the last fifteen years. He drew attention to the marked growth in provincial and municipal expenditures as compared to federal expenditures. This chart has been attached as an Appendix to this Report.

In March 1976, the Committee was told of negotiations with departments which resulted in the total expenditures for 1975-76 over 1974-75 being held to no more than 16%. Further reductions in the percentage level increases were forecast for future years. This has been achieved. The increase of 1976-77 over 1975-76 would appear to be less than the 14% limit set by Treasury Board. Further, the President of Treasury Board stated that while the target increase for 1977-78 over 1976-77 had originally been set at 11%, it has now been revised downward to 7%. Without the reduction in expenditure resulting from the tax point transfer to the provinces, this planned increase would be 9.4%.

There is only one new initiative of any size in this year's Main Estimates. The Employment Strategy under the Department of Manpower and Immigration will require an increase of $286.5 million over the funds provided in last year's Main Estimates.

The Committee was shown the following chart illustrating major changes in expenditures over a ten year period. Based on 100% growth, 26.2% of that growth occurred in programs of the Department of Health and Welfare for transfers to individuals and 22% in programs of the Department of Finance for transfers to other governments. In other words, 48.2% of the growth during that period was for programs of these two departments.

6. The Committee was informed that the increase in the Public Service in man-years for 1977-78 over 1976-77 will be held to about .6%. This compares favourably with a long term average increase of 3.5% and is much below the rate of increase of the total labour force for this year.

Another chart was presented to show the total growth of the Public Service. Over a period of 10 years the Post Office has accounted for 30% followed by the RCMP which has accounted for 9.6%. The large growth in the Post Office arises from the need for more manpower for the delivery of more mail to a larger and increasingly urbanized population. The increase in Environment Canada is slightly misleading in terms of growth over the period because it was reorganized in the 1970's and incorporated man-years from other departments. The increase of 7.2% for Revenue Canada (Taxation), is attributed to the need for more income tax assessors to deal with population increases and business increases.

7. Incorporated in the 1977-78 Main Estimates are the following changes, some of which have been recommended by the Committee over the years.

(a) Non-budgetary statutory items are being included for the first time with the major additions being in the Farm Credit Corporation, Petro Canada, Export Development Corporation, Federal Business Development Bank and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The witnesses explained that this was in keeping with a policy of displaying in the Blue Book of Estimates the full spending plans of the federal government.

(b) The authority to spend revenues received from the private sector has been discontinued in programs within seven different departments such as Insurance in Customs and Excise and Land Management and Development in Public Works, etc. The Committee was told that these revenues will now be placed in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. As a result, the Estimates will reflect total expenditures only in these areas, rather than the net amount.

(c) The statutory payments for the government's contribution as employer to the Unemployment Insurance account previously included in the Estimates of Treasury Board have been added to the programs of each department.

(d) The Energy Supplies Allocation Board has been combined with the Mineral and Energy Resources Program and a new activity has been established to provide for the "Payment of Oil Import Compensation." This move, it is understood, means a reduction of man-years as a result of the absorption of this board into the department.

(e) The International Development Research Centre (IDRC) is shown for the first time as a separate program in recognition of the fact that the federal government has become its main source of funds. Originally the IDRC was intended to be supported by several countries including Canada. Until this year therefore, the federal government's portion has been provided by a grant item under CIDA.

(f) The Publishing Revolving Fund in the Department of Supply and Services which used to be part of Information Canada, has been combined with and included in the Supply Revolving Fund.

(g) Budgetary payments to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have been changed to apply to the fiscal year rather than the calendar year.

(h) A statutory (provisional) contribution has been included in anticipation of the proposed new legislation to cover hospital insurance and medical care under the proposed Federal Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act 1977 which received Royal Assent on March 31, 1977. It was explained that while it is irregular to anticipate the passage of legislation in the Estimates it was done in this case to make the Estimates more informative.

8. Some time was spent by the Committee examining the explanations and tables in the front of the Blue Book of Estimates. On page 1-10 of the Blue Book (Objects of Expenditure) paragraph 19 explains the difference between grants and contributions. The Committee finds that the criteria which determines whether financial assistance to a department will be a grant or contribution is unclear. The witnesses stated that a "contribution" is meant to augment or support an activity of an outside agency or organization whose objectives are directly related to program of the Federal Government. A "grant" is provided to assist a worthy cause not related to any specific program in the government. It is the Committee's view that the basis on which it is decided that a payment should be a grant or contribution is too undefined for effective control. The Committee recommends that the basis for deciding whether a payment is to be a grant or contribution should be more closely defined and should be publicized.

On page 1-12, (vote Structure), paragraph 25, refers to Crown Corporation Deficits and Separate Legal Entities. The Committee questions the practice of making loans to some corporations which are subsequently changed to equity particularly when a loan is made knowing it cannot be repaid in the foreseeable future. The witnesses assured the Committee that initiatives are being taken to convert loans to contributions or transfer payments when the possibility of repayment seems unlikely. In the case of certain Crown corporations a direct payment will be made and in the case of territorial governments, a transfer payment. The Committee recommends that this practice be examined carefully and these ambiguities resolved in any future amendment to the Financial Administration Act.

The Committee discussed the explanation given on page 1-8, paragraph 12, (The Program by Activities Table). The services mentioned include those provided by the Department of Public Works. These are shown for information only and are not charged to departments. A cheque transfer between departments does take place for some other services. The question of charging back to departments has been raised repeatedly during the Committee's present in-depth examination of the Accommodation Program of the Department of Public Works.

The Committee questioned the absence of information regarding expenditures by standard objects in Table 6, (page 1-58) of the Blue Book for a number of Crown corporations such as Canada Council, Canadian Broadcasting Corp., Canada Film Development Corporation, National Arts Centre, National Film Board, etc. It is understood that Treasury Board must maintain this information in some form in order to determine the grant, contribution or payment made by the federal government to these Crown corporations. The President of the Treasury Board stated that it had not been the standard practice in the past to show this information because of the legal and accountability relationship between the government and Crown corporations. Amendments to the Financial Administration Act and the Crown Corporations Act are now being considered which will improve the government's financial control of Crown corporations. The Committee recommends that in future the requisite information in table 6 shown for governmental departments should also be provided for Crown corporations.

Some of the major items in the category "Professional and Special Services" are listed as an adjunct to Table 6, (page 1-58). The Committee has often questioned the increasing amounts in the Estimates for professional and special services. It received assurances last year that a table would be included in future Estimates showing the nature of these payments. The Committee continues to be concerned that consultants may be hired under this standard object thus holding down the increase in authorized man-years. It was assured by the witnesses that in controlling man-years, the device of hiring outside consultants to avoid asking for an increased man-year allotment has not been allowed or used. Many departments have not only had fewer man-years authorized, but have had the money provided for consultants reduced. Notwithstanding this, the witnesses suggested and the Committee agreed that the percentage increases in these major items could be shown in future in order to make clear that increases, where they occur, are based on the nature of the programs.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 16, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

June 16, 1977

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Jean Beetz, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 16th day of June, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Langlois tabled:

Report on Prairie Farm Rehabilitation and Related Activities for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1976, pursuant to section 10 of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, Chapter P-17, R.S.C., 1970.

JUDGES ACT AND OTHER ACTS IN RESPECT OF JUDICIAL MATTERS

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-50, to amend the Judges Act and other acts in respect of judicial matters, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1977

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-53, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970 and other acts subsequent to 1970, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if there will be a further request today for leave to permit any other committee to sit while the Senate is sitting?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, the answer is no. I understand that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will be sitting, but not until after the Senate rises.

Senator Grosart: Do I understand, then, that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will sit only after the Senate rises?

Senator Langlois: Yes, at approximately four o'clock, or after the Senate rises.

Senator Grosart: Has it been suggested that the Foreign Affairs Committee might do the same?

Senator Langlois: No.

Senator Grosart: Before granting leave, honourable senators, I should like to have an explanation as to why it is necessary for the Foreign Affairs Committee to sit while the Senate is sitting today, because we are now getting to the point where the conflict of committees and the sittings of the Senate is almost intolerable from the point of view of this group.

Senator Langlois: Since the request was not made to me but to the Leader of the Government, I think the chairman would be in a better position than I to answer the question.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, as both the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition are aware, we have a heavy load of legislation coming forward to the Senate. I expect three or four bills to come before the Foreign Affairs Committee, this being the first of them. I would not ask for such leave for a continuation of the study on Canada-U.S. relations which is being conducted by my committee, but I did feel that in the case of legislation we should, where possible, give as much attention to it as possible.

The committee is meeting to deal with Bill C-6, respecting Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities in Canada, and as this is legislation which should be expedited I had asked for leave on the understanding that no other committees would seek similar leave this afternoon. As the Foreign Affairs Committee would be the only committee sitting this afternoon at the same time as the Senate, I felt it was a request that I could make of this house.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I could ask the chairman of the committee—it so happens that I am the deputy chairman of that committee, so I am not in any way attempting to obstruct the progress of the work of the committee—if it would not be convenient for him to postpone the meeting until at least 3.00 p.m. or perhaps later?

Senator van Roggen: I would be perfectly prepared to support the honourable senator in postponing the meeting until 3.00 p.m., as I know that he has an interest in this subject and has also a matter to deal with in the chamber before that. I did not wish to wait until the Senate adjourned this afternoon before calling the meeting because I was afraid that we could not adequately deal with the bill before members felt they needed to get away should the Senate not be sitting tomorrow. But, certainly, 3.00 p.m. would be quite acceptable rather than 2.30 p.m.

Senator Grosart: I thank the honourable senator. Leave granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, June 20, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to give, as usual, a summary of the work for the next week.

We are planning to follow the practice of last week and the week before of having the Senate sit on Monday and Tuesday evenings, leaving all day Tuesday for committee meetings. The committee meetings already set down for next week are as follows:

The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is to meet at 9.30 a.m. on Tuesday on Bill S-4, the Petroleum Corporations Monitoring bill, and it is quite likely that this committee will meet again on Tuesday afternoon. Also on Tuesday the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider Bill C-9, the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement Bill, and it will meet again at 2.30 p.m. to consider Bill C-25, the Canadian Human Rights bill.

The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has called a meeting for 9.30 a.m. on Wednesday on the subject matter of Bill C-42, the Combines Investigation Act, and the Agriculture Committee will meet at 3.30 p.m., or when the Senate rises, to continue its inquiry into the beef industry.

On Thursday there will be an in camera meeting of Internal Economy at 11.00 a.m., the Agriculture Committee will hold another meeting of the beef industry at 3.30 p.m., or when the Senate rises, and the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 3.30 p.m.

There will, of course, be additions to this schedule as bills still on the order paper are referred to committee.

Next week will be another heavy week. In addition to the bills already before us we will have to deal with the main supply bill covering the 1977-78 estimates. We can also expect to get Bill C-20, respecting the Office of the Auditor General of Canada, and perhaps Bill C-27, the Employment and Immigration Reorganization Act.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to add that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science will meet at 9.30 Tuesday morning.

Senator Flynn: Could the Deputy Leader of the Government, while we are discussing the program for next week and the last week in June, tell us what pieces of legislation the government expects to pass before we adjourn for the summer?

Senator Langlois: I do not have the list in front of me, but I would say that there are about 10 pieces of legislation still to come to us from the other place, and which should be passed, if the Senate so decides, before we adjourn for the summer recess. I can provide this list later on this afternoon to my honourable friend.

Senator Flynn: Or next Monday?

Senator Langlois: Or next Monday.

Senator Walker: Does the deputy leader expect the House of Commons to adjourn for the summer at the end of next week?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I have on many occasions warned my colleagues in this place that I am not too good at prophecy, but I can tell you that the target in the other place is July 8.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE CHAMBER

TAKING OF PHOTOGRAPHS BY THE PUBLIC—MOTION WITHDRAWN

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I would ask leave of the Senate to withdraw the motion standing in my name on the order paper regarding the taking of photographs in the Senate precincts.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

NOTICE OF MOTION

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I wish to give notice that on Monday, June 20, at the next sitting of the Senate, I will move, seconded by Senator Barrow:

That visitors to Parliament be permitted to take photographs of the interior of the Senate chamber, the Senate antechamber and the foyer of the Senate at all times during visiting hours, except during:

- (a) a sitting of the Senate;
- (b) the period of one hour immediately prior to a sitting of the Senate;
- (c) the period of 15 minutes immediately following the adjournment of a sitting of the Senate; or
- (d) any period when the Senate chamber is closed for maintenance purposes or is being used for such special meetings as may be authorized by the Senate, and only in those areas where visitors are permitted to circulate under the supervision of official tour guides.

● (1420)

Senator Asselin: That is a better motion than the last one.

Senator Riley: Thank you.

Senator Asselin: I did not say I will agree to it, but it is better than the first one.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Grosart, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Macdonald be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Asselin on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

ONTARIO ROYAL COMMISSION ON VIOLENCE IN THE COMMUNICATIONS INDUSTRY

RECOMMENDATIONS—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government related to the so-called LaMarsh Commission on Violence in the Communications Industry. Has the federal government received a report containing the recommendations of this royal commission and, if so, what is the government's reaction to it, inasmuch as most of the recommendations are directed at the federal government?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am not aware of the federal government's having received a copy of this report and, therefore, I am afraid I shall have to take this question as notice and endeavour to reply to it at the earliest possible moment.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HELSINKI AGREEMENT—PRINTED INFORMATION

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, may I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government when I might expect an answer to the two questions I asked over a month ago? I inquired as to the efforts the government has made to promote the export of Canadian printed information which will be used in studying the implementation of the Helsinki Agreement at Belgrade. The conference may be almost over before I get a reply.

I know the Leader of the Government has been trying to get a reply, but I would appreciate knowing why there is this delay.

Senator Langlois: I am pleased to assure my honourable colleague that I will do my best to hasten a reply.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Riley moved the third reading of Bill C-36, to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT
SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT
FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved second reading of Bill C-48, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to introduce Bill C-48, which proposes to extend and, in certain respects, modify the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. Consideration of this bill is a matter of some urgency, because unless action is taken by Parliament the three acts will expire on June 30.

I suspect that, for most honourable senators, it will not be necessary to go into great detail in describing these acts. The legislation has been in existence for quite a few years and amendments to them have been made from time to time, most recently in 1974. Nevertheless, it might be helpful if I recalled a few of the salient facts and features of these acts and proposed amendments.

The oldest of the programs is the one established under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which was introduced over 30 years ago, in 1945. It was followed by the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in 1955, and finally the Small Businesses Loans Act in 1961. The three acts have similar objectives and provisions. Their purpose is to facilitate the availability of intermediate term credit to farmers, fishermen and small businessmen. To this end, the Minister of Finance is authorized to guarantee loans for a wide range of capital improvement projects, including the purchase of implements, machinery and equipment, the purchase, renovation or improvement of buildings and premises, the purchase of land related to the operation of a farm or business, and, in the case of fishermen, the purchase, construction or repair of fishing vessels and the development of shore installations.

The chartered banks have been, by far, the most important lenders under the programs. Other eligible lenders include the Alberta Treasury branches, and institutions such as credit unions and caisses populaires which, under the legislation, may be designated by the Minister of Finance.

An important feature of all three programs, and the one that perhaps distinguishes them most clearly from other types of government guarantee programs, is that loans can be made without the prior approval of the Minister of Finance. This arrangement is greatly appreciated by borrowers because it helps to ensure that loan applications are dealt with quickly and efficiently with a minimum of red tape. At the same time, a lender must conform to certain conditions and requirements, which are set out in the legislation and regulations, if his loan is to be eligible for the government's guarantee. Their requirements relate to such matters as the purpose of the loan, the maximum amount that may be outstanding to an individual borrower, the maximum term and maximum interest rate.

In terms of lending activity, the largest of the three programs has been the Farm Improvement Loans Act. During the 30 odd years of its existence, this act has played an important role in assisting the development of Canadian agriculture. By the end of 1976 there had been over 1,750,000 individual loans made under this legislation, with a total value of over $3.5 million. In 1976, total loans were of the order of $160 million.

Second in importance has been the Small Businesses Loans Act. By the end of 1976 the lending volume under this act had reached $480 million, a figure which represented about 43,000 individual loans. The total value of loans in recent years has risen sharply. It doubled between 1974 and 1975 to over $78 million, and there was a further increase in 1976 to about $81 million.

Lending under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act reached a record level of $12 million in the loan year 1975-76. It is expected to be $10 million to $11 million in the current loan year.

In preparing the amendments contained in Bill C-48, the government consulted a wide range of interested bodies. The views received reflected very broad support for extending the legislation, and for updating its financial limits. There was, however, one major concern expressed by interested parties. This related to the interest rates which lenders are permitted to charge. Businessmen, in particular, have stressed that these rates have not always been high enough to ensure availability of credit in sufficient measure to meet the demand.

The rates of interest for these programs are set by regulation under authority contained in the legislation. The formula currently in use bases the rate on the yields of Government of Canada bonds. This formula, which was introduced in 1968, worked quite satisfactorily for some years but, more recently, this has been less true. Indeed, there have been occasions when the formula rate was well below the chartered bank prime rate. I understand that at one point it was something like 3 per cent below the prime rate. In these circumstances the banks have been somewhat reluctant to participate in the program as fully as would be desirable.

The consensus of representations made on this matter is that the rate should, in future, be related to the chartered bank prime rate, with some margin added to reflect administrative costs. In the light of these representations, the government has opened discussions with the major lenders with a view to revising the present interest-rate arrangements. In doing so its objective is to produce a new formula which, while encouraging greater participation by lenders, will reflect the value of the guarantee of the government and thus be reasonable for borrowers. It is expected that these discussions will be concluded within the near future. Once a new formula has been finally agreed, it would be put into effect by changing the regulations.

If I may, I will now turn to the specific legislative changes proposed in Bill C-48. These also reflect representations which have been received.

First, all three programs would be extended for three years from July 1, 1977, to June 30, 1980. Secondly, the individual lending limit, once again for all three programs, would be raised substantially. At present it is $50,000; it would become $75,000. Thirdly, the eligibility criteria for a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act would be broadened. At present a business enterprise can qualify if its annual gross revenue is $1 million or less. This upper limit would be raised to $1.5 million. Finally, the aggregate loans eligible for the guarantee in the proposed three-year lending period, compared to that currently in effect for 1974-77, the last three-year period, would be raised for all three programs to $1.55 billion under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, to $600 million under the Small Businesses Loans Act, and to $80 million under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

A higher individual lending limit of $75,000 should significantly broaden the scope of this legislation. The more liberal definition proposed for a small business should, in addition, make the Small Businesses Loans Act a more effective instrument in meeting the needs of that important sector. The recommended aggregate lending limits reflect the possible impact of these changes and, perhaps of greater significance, the increase in lending activity which may result from a revision of the present interest-rate arrangement.

These amendments and modifications will, I believe, significantly enhance the value of these three acts, which have already demonstrated their value very well indeed. They will now be better able to meet the capital requirements of farmers, fishermen, and small businessmen, and I commend this bill to honourable senators for their consideration and approval.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 14, the debate on the motion of Senator Hicks for the second reading of Bill C-12, to implement conventions between Canada and Morocco, Canada and Pakistan, Canada and Singapore, Canada and the Philippines, Canada and the Dominican Republic and Canada and Switzerland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I have been wondering whether I should apologize for having risen so often over the last few days to discuss bills before the Senate, particularly when I noted—and Senator Langlois will be interested in this—on reading Hansard that, in the heat of debate, Senator Langlois said—and I emphasize “in the heat of debate”—he was sick of reading my speeches. I was so surprised at that that I did not reply at the time. It had never occurred to me that Senator Langlois would take the trouble to read my speeches. In view of his very regular attendance in the chamber—he is always in his seat—I have the greatest sympathy for him in that he has to listen to them, too. If he is sick of listening to them, I can complement that by saying I am sick of making them.

I am sure honourable senators are aware of the circumstances in which that appears to be necessary, but perhaps it should be explained. We on this side do not choose the bills to take. We discuss the schedule as it comes to us in caucus. Senator Flynn, the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, gets the difficult ones, and the rest are assigned to us by the leader's office according to our time, our interests, and so forth. So, I merely assert again that when I rise in the Senate to speak to a bill, it is not of my own choosing.

But every cloud has a silver lining. I know that a number of honourable senators opposite have been looking for good reasons with which to persuade the Prime Minister to give us a little more help on this side. While the reasons so far do not appear to have prevailed, I suggest to Senator Langlois and other honourable senators opposite that they now have a very strong reason to place before the Prime Minister, that being that if he does not appoint some Conservatives to the Senate they will not only be sick of having to listen to Grosart, but somebody is going to drop dead.

Senator Langlois: You should not have taken it to heart.

Senator Grosart: Bill C-12, as honourable senators well know, is a bill of some substance, comprising 155 pages, seven parts and six schedules. It is a complex bill, but in many ways the general concept will be familiar to honourable senators as it is, in a sense, the second round in the presentation of legislation to the Senate for the purposes of implementing treaties entered into between Canada and various other countries in respect of the avoidance of double taxation in the matter of income tax.

Honourable senators will recall that the first round was discussed in this chamber in the last session during debate on Bill S-32. In some ways this is a milestone bill in the history of Parliament because it gives rise to some fundamental changes in the Standing Orders of the other place, and in certain procedures which are now to be imposed upon the House of Commons and the Senate by act of Parliament.

The countries involved in the first round of conventions respecting the avoidance of double taxation on income were France, Israel and Belgium. The countries concerned in the conventions before us in this bill are Morocco, Pakistan, Singapore, the Philippines, the Dominican Republic and Switzerland. This bill continues our progress on a very long road of legislation.

At the present time we have treaties in this area with 18 countries, and all of them, except those now under revision—the nine—are to be revised, and that means there are nine more to be revised. In addition, there are 40 countries with which it is considered necessary to conclude similar treaties. One of the countries included in a convention that was to have been before us in this bill was West Germany, but it was withdrawn because of certain changes in the corporate taxation structure in that country. It was withdrawn at the last minute from this bill in spite of the fact that the negotiations leading up to that convention had taken nine years. So, I do not know how long it will be before we are in the position of having concluded conventions or agreements with all the countries necessary to put Canadian citizens in the appropriate kind of situation in regard to dividends, investments, royalties and interest in their dealings with those countries. The plain fact of the matter is that both Canadian nationals and nationals of these other countries are under a very severe handicap in their dealings because until these conventions are concluded the withholding tax and tax credit rates will not be satisfactory. In fact, they will be very different from the rates provided for in this bill.

It has been said—indeed it was said by the government spokesman who sponsored the bill in the other place—that on the first round to which I referred the government learned a lesson. It may be that there is a lesson in this bill that the government will learn. The lesson it learned, of course, was that Parliament would not accept a simple proposition, which is repeated in this bill but under much more favourable circumstances, that amendments could be made to these agreements and conventions—treaties, if you like to call them that; there is a distinction in international law, but it is not a very clear one. Normally, in the discussion of the bill the word “treaty” was used frequently. There is a distinction made between what is called “a capital letter ‘T’ Treaty” and “a small letter ‘t’ treaty”, but it is not of much consequence. So, if I use the words “treaty”, “agreement”, or “convention”, I point out that in the usual terminology of international law they are interchangeable with some exceptions. The lesson that was learned by the government was that Parliament would not accept the proposition that an international treaty, convention or agreement could be amended merely by order in council.

Honourable senators may recall what happened to Bill S-32. We raised the question in the Senate and it was discussed in the other place, and there was a general agreement reached at that time that there would be a new procedural methodology developed which has come to be known as the affirmative and negative resolution. This is provided for in the present bill. The general tenor of that agreement was that if any such amendment to a treaty were made by order in council, then it would be submitted under certain terms to both houses of Parliament, and if within a certain period of time no action was taken by either house of Parliament the order in council would stand. I shall go into that in a little more detail later because it is a very interesting formula. But the House of Commons made no provision in its Standing Orders for clarification of the procedure. So we have the extraordinary procedure set out in detail in clause 25 of this bill for both the House of Commons and the Senate, so that in effect this bill creates for both houses new standing orders. I am not objecting particularly to that, because clause 25 also provides that when the time comes that both houses decide to incorporate some sort of formula for dealing with this negative resolution, this section of clause 25 will cease to be effective.

It is a considerable reflection on all of us, honourable senators, that we now have to be faced with a government bill which in effect creates new standing orders for us.

There is a lesson in this bill which may be of help to the government in its on-going negotiations, and I emphasize that because, as I say, this is merely the second round involving nine conventions with at least 49 to come. It is understandable that with the help of the other house we may be able to assist the negotiators in the kind of approach they should be making. I shall deal with that in a moment.

The bill itself proposes an act to implement conventions between Canada and the countries I named. The question of implementation of an international treaty is interesting but not entirely clear. The fact of the matter is that an international treaty can be entered into by the Crown and become an obligation on Canada without any reference whatever to Parliament. This is what is sometimes known as the exercise of the royal prerogative. It has tended to be used less and less.

As long ago as 1926, Mr. Mackenzie King laid down the proposition in a resolution, which was passed unanimously in the House of Commons, that no major treaty—and it defined them in terms of economic and other sanctions—should ever be made effective by the Government of Canada without reference to the House of Commons. Over the years, Mr. Mackenzie King and others expanded that concept, so that today, generally speaking, it is accepted by the government—it might almost be called a convention of our Constitution—that any important contract—which is probably the best word—between Canada and other countries of any major importance must be referred to the House of Commons and the Senate. In spite of that fact, some major agreements have not been so dealt with prior to so-called ratification, and the Auto Pact is one. However, in future we can look forward to all such international contracts being referred to both houses, and that is a qualification of what is sometimes called the principle of adoption; that is, that the law of nations comes into the common law of a country.

Senator Hicks, in his introduction of the bill, referred to that aspect. I am sorry to say it is a nonsensical argument, because it just does not happen. It goes away back to a statement by Blackstone, which is often taken out of context, but there is no way under the Canadian Constitution by which any international treaty or the law of nations can automatically become the law of Canada without implementation. So the purpose of this bill is to give implementation to these treaties. As a matter of fact, though, there is not much implementation involved here, because the conventions themselves are included in the bill as if they were acts already. That, of course, is a reflection of this new omnibus principle—what I call “legislation by wholesale.”

I suppose the intent is, as it was in the bill we had the other day, to include these conventions in this bill by which they become the law of Canada, or some part of Canada, and then at some future point to publish them separately in the revised statutes as acts. I am not quite sure just how that can be done mechanically, but apparently the law officers see no objection to it.

The second clause of each of Parts I to VI of the bill asks that the particular convention referred to be approved and declared to have the force of law in Canada. This raises a major question whether the Government of Canada can, by entering into promises with foreign countries, guarantee to implement the convention in all the laws of Canada. As honourable senators are well aware, there are areas of jurisdiction which are, by the British North America Act, limited to the jurisdictions not of the governments of the provinces but of the legislatures of the provinces.

We have been told that there has been consultation in these cases, but it is interesting to note that there is a fairly new concept in international law which recognizes this problem in federal states. There is a provision in the Vienna Convention of 1969, to which we have acceded, to take care of this situation. It recognizes the fact that Canada cannot undertake to implement the obligations of the treaty in any area where the exclusive jurisdiction is reserved by the British North American Act to the provinces.

There is a further requirement—which may not apply to these conventions but is nevertheless interesting—that there is an obligation on Canada, if any nation with which we are negotiating so requests, that Canada declare the exact extent to which this phrase “the force of law in Canada” means what it would appear to mean to somebody not familiar with our divided jurisdictions.

As I have said, the bill deals with the broad subject of avoidance of double taxation and dividends, interest and royalties earned by companies or individuals in either of the contracting countries. I think we would have to agree that it makes a lot of good, common sense to make such arrangements from time to time. Apart from the obvious equity to individuals and companies in the matter of being relieved of the burden of double taxation, there are broader concepts such as the facilitation of international investments and trade. So it is important that our negotiators carry on with the signing of these conventions.

I mention the unfortunate position that individuals in both countries are in—and this applies at the moment to 49 countries—where just because countries have not been able to get together to sign a contract, their citizens are under distinct financial disabilities. This carries on in spite of negotiated tax credit or withholding rates, and so on, in the neighbourhood of perhaps 10 to 15 per cent, which is more or less normal. The rates, where there are no treaties, will average about 25 per cent.

It is interesting to note that in these negotiations Canada has always been in the position of asking for much higher withholding rates in these areas than other developed countries. In other words, in this area we are a developing country, largely because we are in the same position as those countries in that we are more interested in the revenue we will obtain from those withholding percentages than the normal developed country. I was interested to find that the sponsor of the bill in the other place, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, actually made this statement:

You might regard Canada as more a developing country than the other members of the OECD.

That was Mr. Kaplan in the House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on November 16 of last year, at page 29 of the fourth report. In this area we are in the position of developing countries in wanting higher withholding taxes than the average normal developed country.

There has been a good deal of consultation on the terms of these conventions with the business community and individuals, and there has been widespread advance publicity on which the government is certainly to be commended, because it can be said that the terms do represent an honest consensus of Canadian opinion. One recognizes, of course, that negotiators are always in a difficult position. They have to trade off interests, but by and large it seems to me that they are doing an excellent job, with some reservation on one exception which I will mention in a minute.

I mentioned the omnibus type of bill. I hope the time will come when that kind of bill can be avoided. We are always being told that it is a quick way to get legislation through, but when six conventions in the form of six acts are included in the same bill, to say, “We have passed six acts,” may be the easy way, but I wonder if it is the parliamentary way. We are always told in rebuttal that the bills can be passed faster this way. Had these bills not been prepared as a package in one covering bill, I doubt very much that they would have been held up in the House of Commons or here. The proof of that, to my mind, is in the fact that there were 31 amendments made to the bill—one consequential on the other, admittedly—by the Minister of Finance. They were dealt with in Committee of the Whole in the other place in about ten minutes, because it was explained that they all said the same thing, more or less as these conventions do, with one exception I shall mention. The opposition had seven amendments, which were packaged and dealt with similarly.

This brings me to certain further remarks on clause 19 of the bill, which appears in Part VII. The first six parts are the acts incorporating the conventions, and part VII deals with what are called supplementary conventions, which I mentioned a moment ago. The situation here is understandable. As the tax laws of countries change, it becomes necessary to propose changes in these conventions. Recognizing this, the government moved, as they did with Bill S-32, a little too fast, and have now developed this format which, as I said, really imposes standing orders on both houses. The clause says that this may be done. It says that amendments may be made to these international treaties by order in council, and the phrase is, “subject to prior resolution in Parliament.” This may be a little misleading, although in legal terms it is clear. It means that the order in council, in terms of its legality, constitutionality and effectiveness, is not valid until there has been a resolution, or no resolution, of the matter in Parliament.

The clause provides—and this is a quite extraordinary but understandable procedure which honourable senators perhaps will be interested in having on the record—that the order in council must be laid before both houses of Parliament in 15 days. If no negative motion is filed with the Speaker of either house by the twentieth day, the order in council becomes effective on the thirtieth day. That motion must be proposed by 50 members of Parliament in the other place, or 20 here. Each house has 6 days to take up and consider the motion unless, of course, one has been moved in the other house. The debate is limited to five hours, which is a principle some of us might think may well be applied to certain debates, especially in the other place.

If a negative motion is adopted by one house—that is, a motion which would negative the order in council—it is then sent to the other house, which has 15 days, and five hours of debate, to decide what disposition it will make. If a negative motion is concurred in by both houses—and this is quite a recent change in this methodology—the order in council is then revoked. If the motion is not adopted, or not concurred in, or adopted with amendments, the order in council, of course, comes into force.

The final clause, in effect, requests the two houses to please get to work and include this procedure in their standing orders.

There are certain other matters I would like to refer to. I omitted to say earlier that Senator Hicks, who unfortunately is not here at the moment, gave us a full and complete explanation of this bill, for which I commend him. It was as good an explanation as I have heard of a complicated bill such as this. He discussed other matters, which I will not go into in detail, such as the non-discrimination clauses, the clauses that deal with pensions and annuities, and an odd situation called “tax-sparing”, which, as he explained, is merely an exception for pioneer industries and small businesses which have been given tax incentives.

I come now to the final point that I would like to bring to the attention of honourable senators in connection with this bill, and that is the fact that in one convention, that negotiated with Switzerland, there is an essential difference between article XXV and article XXV in the other conventions. The heading is “Exchange of Information”. The fact that there are substantial changes in the wording, of course, must raise the question in anybody’s mind of why this article is singled out as one in which there is no uniformity with the other conventions. There is a distinct difference in wording, and there are also differences in substance between this and similar conventions that have been negotiated by the United States with Switzerland. This naturally raises questions as to whether, first of all, our negotiators have been as tough or as effective as those of the United States, since the Americans won concessions in this area from the Swiss over a number of years, going back as far as 1951.

The question at issue is those famous Swiss numbered, or hidden, bank accounts. This is of current interest. I do not want to make too close a connection, since the evidence is not complete that such a connection is there, but it does raise the issue that was brought up in regard to certain payments by one crown corporation and another near crown corporation—namely, AECL, in the one case, which is the crown corporation, and Polysar, in the other, which is a subsidiary of a crown corporation, 70 per cent of the shares of which are owned by the government.

These are, therefore, two corporations that are very closely allied to the government, and in both cases there have been very serious allegations of possibly illegal payments in the view of some—certainly quite improper—and in the view of others quite unethical. I believe there is a general consensus that they were the kind of payments that should not have been made. Committees in the other house naturally sought to trace these payments to their source. They were payments which were made to generally unnamed or undisclosed agents, and the committees in the other house found that these agents said in fact, “We are not telling you. We are telling you nothing.”

Generally, those payments were traced to so-called numbered accounts in Swiss banks. This is a bad description because everybody knows that every bank account is numbered, but they are called that because although they are numbered you do not know whose accounts they are, or what the balances are, or anything about them. The Swiss themselves have recently run into a major scandal with Credit Suisse, as a result of the disappearance of $400 million from such an account. The Swiss are embarrassed by it.

It is true to say that the Swiss are themselves concerned about this situation, and they have a good Canadian excuse, which they often offer, which is that this is something that comes under what is called “canton legislation”—that is, legislation arising from special jurisdictions in some of the cantons.

The criticism that has been raised is that if Switzerland is a tax haven, this is the first double taxation avoidance convention that Canada has entered into with a tax haven. The minister sought to prove that Switzerland was not a tax haven. It is not for me to argue that, but I doubt that there are many people who have anything to do with business in Canada who would deny that Switzerland is the No. 1 tax haven country in the world.

● (1510)

Several phrases have been added to the undertakings made in respect to Canada and Switzerland and about the exchange of information. In all of these conventions clause 1 of Article XXV reads:

The competent authorities of the Contracting States shall exchange such information as is necessary for the carrying out of the provisions—

Inserted in the Swiss one, after “such information”, are the words:

—(being information which is at their disposal under their respective taxation laws in the normal course of administration)—

That would seem, on any surface reading, obviously a protection of their position in regard to numbered accounts. In other words, it is a way of saying, "We are not going to be obliged to give anybody information on a universal basis in respect of these accounts."

There is a further addition, although I am not going into all the wording:

No information as aforesaid shall be exchanged which will disclose any trade, business, industrial or professional secret or trade process.

This would seem to me, and it has seemed to others, to be a clear attempt to protect this very lucrative device in the Swiss banking economy. The question that arises is: Are we really enshrining in this bill, and in the Swiss act which will emanate from it, a reluctant agreement that, because we cannot prevent it, we are prepared to enter into a convention with them under which they have the right to carry on this practice which has been generally condemned around the world?

I am not going as far in that as some others have who have criticized it. I have merely attempted to put it as a proposition so that honourable senators may judge whether we are wise in deciding to accept what must be the insistence of the Swiss negotiators that we either enter a convention with these reservations, or have no convention. It is a matter of judgment. I put it on the record so that honourable senators may make their own assessments of this action by Canada.

Unfortunately, Senator Hicks is away, but we have had a private discussion on the matter and I am wondering whether it is necessary for the bill to go to a committee, and, if so, which committee. This raises an old problem. This is an international treaty, and the first type of legislation that our rules say should go to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs is an international treaty. However, the predecessor bill, Bill S-32, went to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which has a long history of expertise on this whole matter of double taxation. For that reason, if it is decided to send this bill to that committee, I would not raise any strong objection at this time. However, I would urge on the leader and the deputy leader that we get away from this idea that any bill that has anything to do with money or taxes automatically goes to that committee. My respect for the work of that committee is well known, and I need not elaborate on it. I merely say it seems to me that when we have a Foreign Affairs Committee, then an international treaty, regardless of its subject matter, should, in future, go to that committee. I leave it to the deputy leader to inform the house on the disposition of this bill, should it receive second reading, without expressing any strong views myself.

Under the circumstances, I am not sure that a great deal more can be done by any further discussion of the points I have raised. They are there; they have been thoroughly discussed. On the other hand, the committee itself may wish to be seized of the bill. So as far as we on this side are concerned, I leave it entirely to the deputy leader to decide what will happen to this bill should it receive second reading.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I will deal first with the opening remarks of my honourable friend when he recalled what was a spontaneous exchange a few days ago, and during which I referred to his many speeches in this house. I wish to add immediately that this spontaneous exchange took place with no malice intended, and I sincerely regret it if I offended my honourable friend. The idea furthest from my mind was an endeavour to curtail, in any way, shape or form, the undeniable right of every member of this house to speak his mind on any question coming before it.

Turning to the suggestion that I should support the plight of opposition members who are asking for their membership to be strengthened, I would remind my honourable friend that two years ago, when we had a most important and prolonged debate on Senate reform, I suggested, as strongly as I could, that no government should ever allow the opposition membership to fall below one-third of the representation in this house as set out in the Constitution. Unfortunately, and to my regret at the time, I saw no member of the opposition rising in his place to support my suggestion and strong recommendation, although later on my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, thanked me for having made the suggestion and even said that he had been surprised by my generosity. I am still of that mind, and I hope that this suggestion will be followed in the very near future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Langlois: On the suggestion that perhaps this bill should not be referred to any committee, I am in the hands of the house. I would be fully in agreement if it is felt that we should give the bill second reading today, and third reading at the next sitting. On the other hand, if it should go to a committee I think it should go to one of the two committees mentioned by Senator Grosart, to wit, the Foreign Affairs Committee or the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. In the past it has been the practice to send these matters to the latter committee. It is true that we are dealing with a treaty, but the subject matter is double taxation, and taxation is within the competence of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. However, as I said, I am completely in the hands of the house. If it is the wish of the house that this bill not be referred to any committee, I will, if it receives second reading today, move that it be put on the order paper for third reading at the next sitting.

Senator Deschatelets: May I ask Senator Grosart a question? At the end of his remarks he said that a day or two ago he had a few words with the sponsor of the bill, Senator Hicks. I am wondering if there was any discussion as to whether or not this bill should be sent to a committee?

Senator Grosart: Far be it from me to paraphrase or attempt to give the house Senator Hicks' views or opinions, but I think I can say that neither of us was insistent that it should go to a committee.

Senator Choquette: Let it go at that.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

● (1520)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

AERONAUTICS ACT AND NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel Lang moved the second reading of Bill C-46, to amend the Aeronautics Act and the National Transportation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in 1974 the Government of Alberta acquired on the open stock market a controlling interest—in fact, nearly 100 per cent—in Pacific Western Airlines, which is an air carrier operating in western Canada. No notification was given to the Canadian Transport Commission, as thought required under section 19 and 20 of the Air Carrier Regulations. Alberta took the position that the regulations did not apply to Her Majesty in the right of the Province of Alberta. On January 9, 1976, the Federal Court of Appeal held that Alberta was subject to the regulations. However, on February 22, 1977, the Supreme Court of Canada reversed that decision. As of today, therefore, the Aeronautics Act does not apply to Her Majesty in the right of a province and, by implication, to Her Majesty in the right of Canada.

The purpose of Bill C-46 is to make the Aeronautics Act specifically binding on Her Majesty in the right of Canada and, perhaps even more importantly, on Her Majesty in the right of any province of Canada. Incidentally, this bill would also make binding on Her Majesty in the right of Canada and Her Majesty in the right of any of the provinces the provisions of the National Transportation Act, which is the act under which the Canadian Transport Commission functions.

In particular, and in short, honourable senators, the bill provides that in addition to the required approval of the Canadian Transport Commission to any transfer of stock of an air carrier to Her Majesty in the right of a province there must be approval by the Governor in Council. Furthermore, the required issuance by the Canadian Transport Commission of a licence to any air carrier in which her Majesty in the right of a province has or is in the process of acquiring a debt or equity interest must also have the approval of the Governor in Council. Such latter order may be issued prior to, but subject to, a subsequent hearing by the commission on a licence application.

Honourable senators, I have condensed what might have been 20 minutes of rhetoric into a quite legalistic and, I hope, exact interpretation of the bill.

By way of penalty for non-observance of its requirements, the bill provides that the Canadian Transport Commission may suspend or cancel the licence of any air carrier which does not comply with the new provisions.

The bill is not retroactive in its effect. It will not apply to the acquisition by the Province of Alberta of control of Pacific Western Airlines.

That is all I am going to say about the bill. I think it is important that jurisdiction over air transport in Canada in terms of the purchasing, scheduling, and operation of airlines, remains under federal control whether the same be under public or private ownership. I think that is of utmost importance to our country in terms of national unity, if in no other way. For that reason I commend this bill to honourable senators for adoption. As to how the Senate might wish to treat the bill, I am in the hands of the Senate. It is only three pages in length. There are constitutional implications which I have not gone into, but I am prepared to try to answer any questions which honourable senators might have in that respect. If my remarks have been adequate, and any answers I might give to questions raised are adequate, it is my hope that it might not be necessary to refer this bill to committee, but that is a decision, ultimately, for the Senate itself.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Haig, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to point out that these estimates total $44.582 million, up from $41.224 million for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1977.

For the fiscal year 1976-77 the main estimates represented an increase of 13.8 per cent over the previous year. In that same period the increase in the GNP was 14.5 per cent. This year's projected 7 per cent increase over the previous fiscal year is less than the forecasted growth in the nominal GNP of 10.8 per cent. Indeed, even if no tax points had been transferred to the provinces, the increase would have been 9.4 per cent, which again would have been less than the increase in the nominal GNP of 10.8 per cent. In short, for the last two years the growth in the estimates of this government has been less than the growth in the nominal GNP, which is something that has been sought by your committee, to my knowledge, for over 10 years.

The policy of constraint, in addition to having an impact on overall expenditures, has an effect on man-years. The man-year increase this fiscal year over last will be held to six-tenths of 1 per cent, as opposed to an average yearly increase in the past of 3.5 per cent and contrasted to a forecast in the growth of employment in Canada for this fiscal year of 1.8 per cent. There has been, however, a tremendous growth in man-years over the last 10 years. Man-years in the federal government in that period have grown from 239,000 to 323,000, an increase of 83,000. It is interesting to note that almost 50 per cent of that growth is in three departments: the Post Office with 25,000 man-years, the RCMP with 8,000 man-years and frighteningly enough, Revenue Canada with 6,000 man-years.

It is interesting to look for a moment at government expenditures as a percentage of the gross national product. In 1964 all governments in Canada took 29.6 per cent of GNP. In 1976 that had increased to 41.0 per cent. Taking each segment of government between 1964 and 1976, here is what you have: The federal government goes from 13.4 per cent to 16.5 per cent; local governments go from 7.7 per cent to 8.7 per cent; hospitals go from 2.1 per cent to 3.2 per cent; but provincial governments go from 6.5 per cent to 12.6 per cent.

If you look at the stance of the federal government in the last two years you will see that there has obviously been an attempt to hold down the magnitude and growth of federal expenditures. In 1975 the federal government expenditures on a national accounts basis represented 17.2 per cent of the gross national product. In 1976 that had fallen to 16.5 per cent, and it should drop again in 1977. Indeed, there is only one spending increase in these estimates of any magnitude, and that is an increase of $286.5 million for the new employment strategy.

So there is the government holding down the increase in its expenditures, but despite that we have an expansionary federal budget. The projected deficit for this year will be $5.7 billion as opposed to $4.5 billion last year. What is interesting about that fact is that tax concessions of $1.7 billion are the major instrument of the expansion, and I for one applaud that change, in that the government is saying to the citizens, "If we are going to expand our budget, we will put more money in your pockets instead of our spending more money."

Let us have a look for a moment at monetary policy in connection with this expanding budget. Senators are aware that over the last while monetary policy has been quite restrictive. The economy has slowed as a result of that, but the present policy, the present stance of the Bank of Canada, is considerably more expansionary. The central bank rate has been systematically lowered over the last few months. The growth of the monetary base, which is the one item over which the central bank has control, is within their target range; but M-1, the growth of the money supply, is well below the target range and there has been a tendency for the gross national product to track fairly well with the growth of M-1.

That is what has the Bank of Canada concerned, because they have not yet been able to get M-1 back to their target range. So they have embarked as a result on a more expansionary policy. But what has happened is that M-II has grown well beyond the target range, and in this respect we have a danger.

Senator Lang: Would the honourable senator please tell me what the distinction between M-I and M-II is?

Senator Everett: M-I is demand deposits and currency in the system; M-II is M-I plus time deposits.

The danger of this situation is that when M-I, which tracks with the GNP, is below the target range, the central bank is encouraged to increase the money supply. The result can be that if M-II is above the target range, which it is today, M-II can then be translated into demand deposits and there can be an incredible increase in M-I over a very short period of time. If the central bank were to continue on this line, the result could be an increase in the inflationary environment of Canada, especially since inflation is bound to be exacerbated by the lower value of the Canadian dollar and especially while certain price increases such as petroleum price increases and food price increases work their way through the economy.

So there is this danger on the horizon in respect of inflation.

There were three areas of concern to the committee when it examined the estimates. One respected loans to crown corporations, loans made at a time when the government knows, or should know, that they will not be repaid. There has been a tendency for the government to convert such loans to equity. Indeed, in conversation with the Treasury Board officials we were informed by them that instead of making loans which they knew would not be repaid, the Treasury Board had agreed to make contributions and had also agreed to recommend an amendment to the Financial Administration Act.

In addition, the committee recommended that information on crown corporations should be shown as expenditures by standard objects, as is done for other government departments. At the present time the spending information on crown corporations is not shown in the estimates in the way it is for other departments, and we believe the control of Parliament would be increased if that were done. That would affect such crown corporations as the Canada Council, the CBC, the Canadian Film Development Corporation and the National Film Board.

A third area which the committee was concerned with was the hiring of outside consultants. The committee has been worried that perhaps outside consultants are being hired when the authorized man-years are about to be exceeded in a department. We have been assured by Treasury Board that that is not the case. They have agreed in future to provide us with additional information so that we can exercise greater control over this possibility.

Honourable senators, I wish to say in closing that I am not happy with this report. Nor do I think any member of the committee is happy with it. There is a reason for that.

Some time ago we decided that our main thrust should be to make a detailed examination of particular departments or particular programs. We began that with Information Canada, which turned out to be a detailed examination of the information services of government, which in turn turned out to be rather large and not under control. We then made a detailed examination of Canada Manpower and were pleased that of 56 recommendations 52 were agreed to by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. At the present time the committee is examining the Department of Public Works, and I think I report fairly on behalf of the committee that that examination is going well. Because the examination of the Department of Public Works will be concluded by the end of this month, the committee is presently looking at new subjects to examine and hopes to have one decided upon for recommendation to the Senate when we return in the fall.

● (1540)

The difficulty of all this is that there has been insufficient time for the committee to examine the blue book of estimates properly. Under the block system the committee is allowed two hearing days every second week. In order to do the effective, detailed examination that we are doing we require those days, and it has been very difficult to give them up for an examination of the blue book; however, happily, we have now been given an additional Wednesday and we will develop a new format which will include our detailed examination of a program or a department, but will also include a much more detailed and comprehensive examination of the blue book, including the policies and accounting procedures, and some examination of the more important spending departments in that book.

In a sense I apologize for this report to the Senate, and I hope that next year at this time when we table our report it will be a much fuller and much more meaningful document.

Senator Burchill: Honourable senators, Senator Everett does not need to make any apology for this report. I think it is a splendid report. I would like to ask him, however, with regard to provincial government expenditures, how the federal transfers to the provincial governments compare as between 1975 and 1976.

Senator Everett: There is a table at the back of our report which gives that information. In 1975 the federal government's total expenditures were 17.2 per cent of the GNP. Exclusive of transfers they would have been 10.5 per cent. In 1976 they were 16.5 per cent, and exclusive of transfers, again, they would have been 10.3 per cent.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H. A. Olson moved the second reading of Bill C-34, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act respecting the establishment of marketing plans and to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I regard it as an honour and a pleasure to introduce Bill C-34 to this house, and I want to inform honourable senators that my remarks will be substantially shorter than I had intended them to be, since I know there are committees that are trying to meet this afternoon which have some very important business before them.

The main purpose of Bill C-34, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act respecting the establishment of marketing plans and to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act in consequence thereof, is to provide the rapeseed producers of western Canada with an opportunity to set up marketing pools so that those producers who do not wish to sell their rapeseed and receive only the amount that the market happens to provide that day may enter into pooling arrangements of several kinds for the purpose of sharing in the average price, if you like, throughout the crop year.

The main part of this bill is contained in clause 2, and the purpose of this amendment is to establish a legislative scheme to facilitate this joint marketing of rapeseed and other grains that are not marketed through the Canadian Wheat Board at the present time. The amendment would enable the establishment by order, and on the fulfilment of certain conditions, of plans for the joint marketing of grain that would include provision for the pooling of sales receipts from grain, and also a system of initial payments. I might say that those initial payments are not available to rapeseed growers at the present time.

To encourage the establishment of one or more of these schemes, the provision is made that certain losses incurred under a plan may be recoverable from the Government of Canada. Participation by producers in a plan would be voluntary, but once a producer has agreed to participate in the plan, then of course the delivery of his grain and the receipt of that grain from a producer by an elevator company would be mandatory, and for it to go outside the pool would be contrary to the terms of the plan and would constitute an offence.

I should like to advise honourable senators that that is the main purpose of clause 2, and all the other clauses up to clause 5 are consequential on passing what is contained in clause 2.

Clauses 5 to 7 are amendments to the Western Grain Stabilization Act, so that there may be levies taken from these pooling schemes for the purposes of the producer, and indeed the government, too, of paying contributions into the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. All of the other amendments, that is, those following clause 7, are consequential on this amendment to provide for these pools to be included in the Western Grain Stabilization Act.

I ought to give a brief explanation of what I think can properly be regarded as fairly widespread producer support for this kind of legislation in western Canada by the people who could, on a voluntary basis, be affected by it. The legislation contains an important revision which would encourage the establishment of these voluntary pools, and I might also say that it is voluntary for the pools and the grain companies to set up or to establish a pool or several pools.

As you will probably note from the bill, more than one marketing scheme can be operated side by side. Under the legislation the minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into an initial payments guarantee agreement with the operator of the pool plan. Under this agreement the government would pay up to 90 per cent of any operating deficit or loss incurred by the pool. This guarantee is not a new departure in policy, because it is similar to the guarantee that is provided by the government now with respect to the Canadian Wheat Board's initial payments, which are made under the pooling of those grains that are already being handled by the Canadian Wheat Board.

As I said earlier, more than one scheme could be put into effect. I think there are essentially two types of voluntary pooling plans that could be established under this enabling legislation. The precise type of pooling plan that will be established depends, of course, on the willingness of the companies normally marketing grain, which would be the wheat pools and the other private grain companies, to develop the pooling schemes.

One type of voluntary pooling plan would be a full pooling system similar to the Canadian Wheat Board pooling system for wheat, oats and barley, and this would, of course, involve the pooling of the total sales revenues obtained from the marketing of rapeseed in the export and domestic markets; then, of course, the distribution of these final revenues after marketing costs have been deducted, and these payments would be made to participating growers as their final payment.

There is, however, another type of pooling plan, which could be referred to as a street price averaging scheme. With a street price pool the producers who opted to participate would merely have a portion of their street price retained by the pool when they marketed their rapeseed at the end of the pool period. The total moneys in the pool would be averaged and each participating producer would receive the same final payment.

The pool itself would not buy or sell rapeseed; it would merely provide a service to the participating producers by averaging or pooling a portion of their sales receipts for their rapeseed marketed during that year. The producer would not share in the final sales revenue obtained by the firm in marketing the rapeseed in either the domestic or the export market. For a larger rapeseed grower this is already possible; he can achieve this on his own by merely arranging his deliveries so that he markets his product at different times during the year to obtain an average price. However, for the smaller grower this is not always possible, as we may have not sufficiently large production or quantities to spread his deliveries out over the year and therefore participate in some of those periods when prices are high.

It is also a problem that there are times when a smaller producer, or any producer for that matter, is unable to deliver his grain, his rapeseed, to an elevator, even though he may believe the price that day is adequate, or that it is perhaps one of the better days to sell it. Therefore, these pooling schemes do provide for those producers who want to take an average price throughout the year under one or several pooling schemes.

I should inform honourable senators that there was a plebiscite of rapeseed producers in 1974. At that time 46 per cent of producers voted for the Canadian Wheat Board to take over the marketing of rapeseed, for what we would refer to as a full pooling system, and 53 per cent voted against a full pooling system for all of the rapeseed.

It seems to me that with this enabling legislation the amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act contained in Bill C-34 that are before you provide producers with the option of going for either no pooling or full pooling. Indeed, from one year to the next I think they can opt in or out. However, I should make it clear that for any particular marketing year, if they have opted to go into a pooling scheme their permit book will be endorsed to that effect, and they are required to stay with the pooling scheme for the rest of that crop year. This is one of the reasons that some of these voluntary pooling schemes have not been so successful in the past, because of producers declaring that they will go into the pool and then, before the pool period is finished, they have either attempted to withdraw or have in fact withdrawn from it. It will be made clear to producers that if they enter into a pooling arrangement to average the price over the whole crop year, they will be obliged to stay with that pooling until the end of the crop year.

There is much more that could be said about the history of these pooling arrangements and the support that many farmers have given to the Canadian Wheat Board because of the manner in which it has handled the selling of their grain over the years, but for the sake of time I think the explanation I have given may be adequate to establish the principle of what is involved in Bill C-34.

While I am not sure of the arrangements that can be made later, I would suggest that this bill, if it receives second reading, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, at which time we could call before us witnesses from the Canadian Wheat Board and from those administering the Western Stabilization Act, to get more detail of the administrative plans they have for it.

I would commend this legislation to honourable senators, and hope that it passes through all stages in this house, and indeed that it becomes law before the end of this session, so that for the ensuing crop years—not 1977-78 but following that—the grain companies can proceed with this enabling legislation to set up voluntary pools for it.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Jean Beetz, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2).

An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act (No. 2).

An Act to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

An Act to amend the Export Development Act.

An Act to amend the Financial Administration Act and to repeal the Satisfied Securities Act.

An Act to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act.

An Act to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act.

An Act to amend the Railway Act.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 20, at 8 p.m.

THE HONOURABLE KEITH DAVEY

NEWSPAPER REPORTS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege under rule 34 of the Senate. On Thursday, June 9, the Toronto Sun carried an article about me which was inaccurate, misleading, unfair and full of innuendoes. Because the Sun has earned a reputation for this kind of McCarthy-like attack I decided to ignore this article. I reached this decision notwithstanding the advice of solicitors that the article is actionable. However, now the same material has been carried by other more consequential media outlets as well as showing up in debate in the other place. In all of these circumstances I want to set the record straight.

The Sun article was headed, "Senator Has 50 per cent of Racing Business." It opened with this paragraph:

Liberal Senator Keith Davey holds the controlling 50 per cent ownership interest in an Ontario harness racing business in which one of the associates recently pleaded guilty to five charges of fraud.

It continued with this paragraph:

The senator's interest was revealed on April 25th in London provincial court when William Frank Floyd, of London, pleaded guilty to five charges of fraud, none of which involved the racing operation. He was fined $10,000.

The article goes on to describe in florid detail other activities of Mr. Floyd which, to say the least, were unsavory. The juxtaposition of this material in an article headed, "Senator Has 50 per cent of Racing Business," is, in my judgment, clearly defamatory. Perhaps someone might argue that legally that is fair comment on a public person. In any event, it is a smearing tactic of a yellow journal. Indeed, the very next day the Sun editorialized in part as follows:

While there's no suggestion that Senator Davey was involved in anything illegal, the Caesar's wife adage is applicable: More pure than pure.

The editorial concludes:

The Senator was indiscreet. He should have a higher regard for propriety. He does neither his boss, the PM, nor the Senate any favours by business involvements with a questionable partner.

The facts, as any newspaper with respect for its readers would have discovered, are these: Mr. Floyd's family were and are well known and well respected in their community. Mr.

Floyd represented himself to be a partner in established and respected enterprises. He appeared to be both a substantial and a reputable individual in the community, and he had been passed upon by organizations much better suited and equipped to check his credentials than I.

The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce during the same period of time investigated Mr. Floyd's reputation and position and were sufficiently impressed with the results of their investigation to approve him for loans well in excess of a hundred thousand dollars.

The Toronto Sun, in June of 1977, after Mr. Floyd had been convicted, "knows him to be a person of questionable character." How astute! But, in 1975, neither the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce nor Senator Davey were in possession of any facts which could have led to such a conclusion. On the contrary. In 1975 Mr. Floyd appeared to all to be a respectable member of the community.

Let us also look at the Sun's tactics as compared to basic journalistic honesty and trust. The heading "Senator has 50% of Racing Business" seems designed to state as fact that a racing business exists in June of 1977 and that I own half that business. No such racing business existed in 1977. No such racing business existed in 1976. For a very short period in 1975, and as a test only, a racing business existed. How, why and owned by whom?

• (2010)

I have known Loren Cassina for 25 years. He is a dear and respected friend. He is a sports entrepreneur known and respected internationally who, for example, participated with Madison Square Gardens and Top Rank Inc. in the promotion of the Ali-Norton championship fight last September in Yankee Stadium. Mr. Cassina had done a great deal of work in researching harness racing and had developed an idea to bring more racing of high quality to the smaller centres in Ontario. He had in 1974 worked to that end both at the federal and provincial level.

In late 1974 Mr. Cassina approached me regarding joining him in this venture. My legal counsel advised that no conflict of interest would result provided I clearly stated my interest and did not misuse my position. My interest was open and clear and I did nothing which could in any way be a misuse.

Goderich had already been approved both federally and provincially for racing and indeed had been granted nine racing dates in 1975, all before Cassina and/or Blue Water Racing Associates Inc. were on the scene.

The Duncannon Agricultural Society had the racing dates for the Goderich track and the Goderich Trotting and Agricultural Society operated these Dungannon dates for several years.

Blue Water made two separate transactions: one with Dungannon to operate their days and the other with the Goderich Trotting and Agricultural Society and the town of Goderich for use of the facility.

My participation in Blue Water was to have been less than one-third. On March 12, 1975, Mr. Cassina, alone, attended a hearing before the Ontario Racing Commission. The commission published its decision in a letter to Mr. Cassina and Blue Water dated March 14, 1975. They granted the extended racing dates from nine days to nineteen days. The commission attached certain "provisos" to their approval. The approval was for a "test period only." Blue Water was on trial as an operator of the track.

A second condition put forth by the Ontario Racing Commission, a provincial agency, was that I was to acknowledge that I or York Sports Investments was to have or maintain at least a 50 per cent interest in Blue Water. This proviso had not previously been discussed. It was contrary to my understanding. However, since time was short, because our first racing date was quickly approaching, it was felt this term should be met. As between the interested parties, it was agreed that I or York Sports would hold 50 per cent of Blue Water regardless of the fact that I would not receive 50 per cent of any profits. Indeed no profits were expected from this test period.

I instructed my solicitor to incorporate York Sports Investments Limited to own 50 per cent of Blue Water. It was incorporated May 20, 1975. The Blue Water racing test at Goderich lasted from May 20, 1975 to September 26, 1975. Blue Water did not operate in racing after September 26, 1975.

It had been decided that once the test period was over we would consider further racing dates but in a location and facility other than Goderich. It was also decided that York Sports would be owned as to 35 per cent Loren Cassina; as to 35 per cent myself and as to 30 per cent Simms Shuber, Q.C., of Toronto. So honourable senators can see that my ownership was not to be 50 per cent but only 35 per cent of 50 per cent or, in reality, only 17.5 per cent of Blue Water.

The reality was that the venture not only failed but lost money. Blue Water did not do any racing business in either 1976 or 1977. York Sports is dormant. At no time was there any communication between me and my partners, me and Agriculture Canada, or me and the Ontario Racing Commission that said, indicated or suggested that I would be responsible for licences, nor was that my function. Incidentally, as a result of this sort of muck-raking, the ever-zealous member from Central Nova in the other place has discovered that I am a director of Hydroculture Luwassa, a privately owned Canadian company which grows plants without soil.

In Friday's Toronto Star Mr. MacKay is quoted as follows:

Then I began to think: Well, there is enough greenery and foliage around some of these government offices to make a Tarzan movie and one would expect to see a cheetah peeking through some of these government buildings.

You know, honourable senators, when these newspapers do it to you, they really do it up brown. This article in the Star is picturesquely headed, "Davey Using Position to Make Money: M.P."

Although I have not made, nor would I make, any representation to any government official about this company, I thought I should check out how much business Luwassa was doing with the federal government. It appears the company has done a grand total of about one thousand dollars worth of business with several different departments of the federal government. As well, the Department of Agriculture has three containers, on consignment, on an experimental basis, to study the company's process. This represents, quite literally, such an infinitesimally small fraction of the company's business as to make Mr. MacKay's remarks ludicrous.

For a long time now I have supported conflict of interest guidelines for senators and members of the other place. Meanwhile, I think my record speaks for itself. Unhappily, however, truth is not a defence against this style of journalism.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Textile and Clothing Board entitled "Clothing Inquiry", dated May 29, 1977, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, pursuant to section 17 of the Textile and Clothing Board Act, Chapter 39, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1977-1617, dated June 9, 1977, respecting the removal of reduction in tariffs under paragraph 3(1)(b) of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, pursuant to section 5(3) of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, Chapter A-18, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on operations under the Clean Air Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1976, pursuant to section 41 of the said Act, Chapter 47, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, June 21, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, June 22, 1977, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

PARKING FOR SENATORS' CARS—QUESTION

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, to my surprise, on Thursday afternoon last I found that the small parking area on the north side of the roadway immediately behind the East Block, which for many years has been allocated for the exclusive use of senators, was changed. The word "Senators" was removed, and a new number assigned to that area. It is a convenient parking place for approach to the main door of the Senate, where one normally likes to enter in order to see the notice board for committee meetings, and so on. It is a parking area that I have used for a long time. This area now has the new number 352.

I wonder to whom permission to use that area 352 has been assigned? I believe that under rule 20, one can ask a question of this kind of the Leader of the Government or the chairman of a committee.

I see by the notice board that the External Affairs Committee is meeting on Thursday; perhaps then we could hear something about why this particular change was made. Previously, it was an area exclusively and conveniently reserved for senators.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no information concerning this apparent problem, and I must take the question as notice.

ONTARIO ROYAL COMMISSION ON VIOLENCE IN THE COMMUNICATIONS INDUSTRY

RECOMMENDATIONS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on June 16 Senator Olson asked if the federal government received a report containing the recommendations of the Ontario Royal Commission on Violence in the Communications Industry, and, if so, what is the government's reaction to it inasmuch as most of the recommendations are directed at the federal government.

I have been informed by the minister's office that the Honourable Jeanne Sauvé has received this very lengthy document, and it is presently under study.

THE ENVIRONMENT

PROTECTION OF COASTAL WATERS AND SHORELINES FROM OIL POLLUTION—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on May 12 Senator Greene asked a question about oil tankers and the protection of coastal waters and shorelines from oil pollution. His question was:

Has Canada issued regulations governing oil tankers passing through Canadian waters en route from Alaska (Valdez) to U.S. ports, to safeguard the environment of the British Columbia coast?

The answer is:

Under Part XX of the Canada Shipping Act, Canada has enacted anti-pollution regulations which are amongst the most stringent in the world. These regulations apply in Canadian waters out to the edge of the 12-mile territorial sea and in the exclusive fishing zones in effect prior to January 1, 1977; in other words, in areas such as the Strait of Juan de Fuca where vessel source pollution poses the greatest threat to our marine environment and coastline.

A supplementary question was asked by Senator Grosart:

What is the official Canadian definition at the present time of 'territorial waters'?

The answer is:

Under the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, the Territorial Sea of Canada is defined as 'those areas of the sea having, as their inner limits, the baselines described in Section 5 (of the Act) and, as their outer limits, lines measured seaward and equidistant from such baselines so that each point of the outer limit line of the territorial sea is distant twelve nautical miles from the nearest point of the baseline'.

A third question was asked by Senator Smith (Colchester):

Is there any technical difference between the terms 'territorial waters' and 'territorial sea'?

The answer is no.

A question by Senator Williams, still on the same subject, was as follows:

Has the government considered the safety aspect of the risks caused by giant oil tankers transiting particularly congested waters in the area of the Strait of Juan de Fuca?

The answer is:

(d) Yes. Canada and the United States have taken a number of separate and joint measures to reduce to the greatest extent possible the risk of oil pollution from tankers in these waters. The Canadian Coast Guard, in co-operation with the U.S. Coast Guard, has implemented a traffic separation scheme which has been in effect in the Strait of Juan de Fuca since 1975 with a view to enhancing tanker safety and minimizing the risk of collisions and groundings. The Vessel Traffic Management Centres at Vancouver and Seattle are in constant contact with each other on a routine basis, and exchange information on vessel movements in the area. Discussions are currently under way between Canada and the United States to improve this vessel traffic management system and expand its coverage. The two countries are inter alia committed to an accelerated program of installation of radar equipment for vessel traffic management purposes through the area of the Strait.

EFFECT ON CANADA OF LEAKAGE IN ALYESKA PIPELINE—QUESTION

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator permit an ancillary question in a slightly different vein? A member of the United States Congress is reported to have said yesterday that the Alyeska Pipeline was going to flow with oil today whether it leaked like a sieve or no. If such be the case, I wonder if the leader could report to this house on the potential effect of leakage from the Valdez line, which is in United States territory, and what would be the effect on Canadian territory south of the Valdez line if this line is to be permitted to flow whether it leaks like a sieve or no?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice.

JUDGES ACT AND OTHER ACTS IN RESPECT OF JUDICIAL MATTERS

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator McIlraith moved third reading of Bill C-50, to amend the Judges Act and other acts in respect of judicial matters.

Senator Lawson: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few brief comments on this bill to protest what I consider to be the inadequate increases proposed for judges.

The Minister of Justice, in announcing these increases, indicated that judges have not received an increase for more than two years. He qualified that by saying that the cost of living increased approximately 15 per cent during that period, and proposed an increase of 3½ per cent per year for judges. It seems to me that, in face of the amounts of increases that have been proposed under the anti-inflation guidelines and have been allowed, certainly up to the maximum of $2,400, and many others that have gone unchallenged of $10,000, $20,000, $30,000 a year, and up to a $60,000 a year increase for the head of the Chrysler Corporation, surely we and the minister have a responsibility to take better care of our judges.

I think it is enough that we ask them to give up their highest earning years, and in many cases to go to the bench for, perhaps, half the salary they could earn in private practice. Surely there must be a responsibility, when we ask them to serve their country in that fashion, to at least see that they keep pace by recommending increases up to the maximum of $2,400.

Therefore, for the judges, who are unable to speak on their own behalf and are not able to register a protest, I certainly want to add my voice of protest to the minister and to the government for not at least recognizing the maximum under the guidelines.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I had not expected this point to be raised. I am quite frank about it, because I am one of those who believe that inflation will not be stopped, that it will carry on, to the detriment of all workers, unless there is restraint in the amount of increases given where increases are not particularly required for reasons of maintaining a standard of living.

● (2030)

I believe I could leave the subject at that point, but I hope I have made it clearer that it is not possible to grant increases at large for the sake of increases and hope to succeed in slowing down or stopping inflation, which some still hope can be done.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT
BILL, 1977

THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-53, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970 and other acts subsequent to 1970.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-12, to implement conventions between Canada and Morocco, Canada and Pakistan, Canada and Singapore, Canada and the Philippines, Canada and the Dominican Republic and Canada and Switzerland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT
SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT
FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 16, the debate on the motion of Senator Stanbury for the second reading of Bill C-48, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, at this time of the year we become accustomed to advertisements of automobile firms attempting to sell used automobiles, the claim being that they are in as good shape as a new car and functioning perfectly. The bill before us reminds me of a used car salesman attempting to sell a used car and, in so doing, making it appear as good as new. He touches up a few rust spots, attempts a motor tune-up and adds a bit of chrome. He then stands back and says that the automobile is as good as new. Honourable senators, I don't have to tell you that I don't like the sound of the motor and I don't trust the dealer.

The three acts to be amended by Bill C-48 were introduced at different times, the Farm Improvement Loans Act having been introduced in 1944, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in 1952, and the Small Businesses Loans Act in 1961. We have had ample time to assess the manner in which the three acts have operated and to consider whether or not further amendments or renovations are necessary. In arriving at any decision in that regard, we should consider not only the total amount loaned since the inception of each program, but the average loan last year. The average loan under the Farm Improvement Loans Act in 1976 was $7,400; under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act it was $12,688, and under the Small Businesses Loans Act it was $15,826. These loans, by today's standards, are very small and very inadequate. In farming, for example, land costs have increased substantially; building costs have doubled. Fuel costs have greatly increased, and fertilizer and pesticide costs have increased 70 per cent. In addition, the cost of farm machinery has increased drastically. A self-propelled combine today can cost $65,000. If we add the expected inflation, the figure will be beyond the maximum of $75,000 allowed under this bill.

The fisheries industry has also faced increased costs in much the same manner as agriculture. Notwithstanding, the number of inshore fishermen has been limited. As a result, the licence held by a retiring fisherman is often more valuable than his boat and gear. An individual entering the commercial fisheries field now has to purchase a licence in order to work. I recall when a number of members of this chamber, when in the other place, used to advocate the right to work. The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act does very little for these people. Instead, they must turn to provincial government schemes. The Province of Newfoundland, for example, provides loans to fishermen at an interest rate of 3 per cent. The other Atlantic provinces have similar loan programs, although at a higher interest rate.

I do not anticipate a rush on the part of fishermen in applying for the maximum loan under this bill of $75,000, the simple reason being that their income is not such that they would be in a position to repay the loan.

● (2040)

The average loan to the small businessmen last year will not create an economic expansion. The small business sector is a very important area of our economy, employing about 60 per cent of our workers. The rapidly increasing number of bankruptcies and business closings clearly indicates the urgent need for something more than a recognition of inflation such as is provided in Bill C-48. Small business has had to meet the same problems that agriculture and fisheries have had to meet. When we speak of business perhaps we are more inclined to consider inflation than we are in dealing with agriculture and fisheries. And the 1961 dollar—because that is the year small business loans were introduced—is today worth 48 cents. This destroys the idea that the amendments proposed in Bill C-48 are generous or that they will be of benefit to small businesses. They will do nothing more than meet that element of inflation which has occurred since the inception of this act.

Honourable senators, anyone dealing with the small businessman has often heard the complaint that the chartered banks refuse to make loans under the Small Loans Act. Perhaps we should increase the measure of government guarantee provided by the federal government under the act, but I think the real reason for that is the fact that the banks are able to loan elsewhere at a greater profit. Recently I recommended to a friend of mine that he should attempt to obtain a small business loan. He went to his bank manager and he was told that no such program existed. Then when I sent him literature, he took this to his bank manager and the bank manager said, "In this town there is one bank. You can deal with it on our terms or go down to the next bank." And that, honourable senators, is 40 miles down the road. He received a loan, but it was a second mortgage on his house at about 13½ per cent to 14 per cent interest. This was a long way from the prime rate designed under this program.

The minister who introduced Bill C-48 in the other place indicated that the government was negotiating with chartered banks for prime rate plus, possibly, two points for administration costs. I find it extremely difficult to understand why a bank, on a federally guaranteed loan, should require two interest points for administration. Most mortgages include a quarter of one per cent for administration. Therefore I ask: why should the chartered banks require such an exorbitant spread in order to make these loans under the three acts being amended by Bill C-48? The banks very seldom become involved in the collection; they merely notify the Department of Finance of their loss and then are usually quite content to let it go at that.

I believe the program would be much more effective if the act contained a requirement that the banks provide a specific percentage of their loans under the three programs in Bill C-48.

Earlier I mentioned lower repayments. Need I remind honourable senators that mortgage loans can be amortized over 25, 30 or even 40 years? Yet the loans provided under these three programs must be repaid within 10 years unless the loan has been for land purchase, and then repayment can be over a 15-year period. Why should we give a longer period for repayment of a mortgage than for a small business loan or a farm improvement loan or a fisheries loan? All three industries are subject to severe market fluctuations, and in the case of farming and fishing these two industries can be very adversely affected by weather. Two consecutive poor years and they can be out of business. If amortization could be increased, I believe a greater benefit could be obtained under these programs.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Petten moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 16, the debate on the motion of Senator Olson for the second reading of Bill C-34, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act respecting the establishment of marketing plans and to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act in consequence thereof.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the sponsor of Bill C-34 in this chamber, the Honourable Senator Olson, a former federal Minister of Agriculture, explained the principle and some of the clause of this bill rather briefly, although clearly, leaving a fuller examination to be made in the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture once second reading has been given.

With this vast experience of agricultural matters, I should like to have heard from him a fuller account of the marketing and administrative problems of a pooling system such as the Canadian Wheat Board, a single selling agency with compulsory features and the best experience with pools of a voluntary nature.

Agriculture has been and is the backbone of the Canadian economy. Statistics for the last year show that, if grain and oil seeds were excluded, Canada would have a deficit of $1.5 billion for food. In other words, we would not have a sufficient supply of food if we did not have large quantities of good grain and oil seeds. Federal and provincial governments, the economic interest and Canadians in general must realize before the situation worsens that agriculture is most vital in our economy, and must be in a healthy state.

Farmers on the prairies have lived through extreme circumstances. They prospered when they sold their grain at high prices, bringing boom periods to this country; they suffered from exceedingly low prices for their products when Canadians had to survive through depressions. Farmers are victims of great fluctuations of prices. They have long memories of bitter experiences in the past, of unstable prices and unstable weather conditions. They are aware of the uncertainty of the present and future. Therefore, they yearn for stability and a reasonable return for their labours.

We know that the farming community of western Canada is generally happy with the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board Act and the Western Grain Stabilization Act, as these have helped to improve their lot. Bill C-34, as has been explained by the sponsor, provides for voluntary pooling of rapeseed and other non-board grains by amending the Canadian Wheat Board Act to permit associations of producers, processors and traders to establish voluntary pools approved by the minister, with the federal government guaranteeing 90 per cent of the initial payments against pool proceeds.

Other provisions in the bill amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act to include commodities which will be marketed under this act through these voluntary pools. Since at least at the initial stages there has been no demand for the establishment of voluntary pools for other non-board grains, such as oats, barley, rye, buckwheat, feed wheat and flaxseed, the prime concern of this bill is for rapeseed—which, incidentally, is not to be confused with rape—and the rapeseed industry.

The question of the marketing of rapeseed won the attention of the federal government after a poll of rapeseed producers in December 1973 revealed that only 46 per cent desired to market their product through the Wheat Board. The majority, although small at the time, wanted voluntary pools. I understand that government spokesmen now believe, over three years later, that that majority has increased, which means that rapeseed producers are for voluntary pools rather than for the compulsory pooling system of the Wheat Board.

Senators should be aware that the rapeseed industry has made a spectacular rise, with Canada becoming the world's leading exporter of this product, maintaining a 70 per cent share of the world market in the last five years. It is in stiff competition with soybeans, peanuts, sunflowers and other oil seeds, which account for 94 per cent of the world oil seed production. Although first grown in Canada in 1943, rapeseed came into prominence in 1955 because it was a quick-selling cash crop which could be readily grown in relatively poor soils. In 1971, some 95 million bushels were produced in Canada. That was a record. A year later, production was down to 69,838,000 bushels, and in 1975 only 41,217,000 were produced. This constituted from 7 to 10 per cent of the field crop income. The production of rapeseed has been volatile, depending on world demand and on competitiveness in the world market.

In this decade there has been a tremendous fluctuation in the price of rapeseed. The price in 1971-72 was $2.16 a bushel to the farmer; it reached $7.06 in 1975, but in 1976 it dropped to $5.10. Great fluctuations have taken place within months. For example, in 1973 Winnipeg prices of rapeseed dropped from $6.80 on August 14 to $4.16 on October 2. That was a drop of $2.64 a bushel in six weeks. That, of course, presents real difficulties to farmers of rapeseed, as they cannot plan their production in terms of income and expenditures with any kind of certainty. Accordingly, many farmers have reduced rapeseed production and have changed to other grains or to mixed farming.

It is apparent that the government is trying to meet the needs of rapeseed farmers, who are demanding voluntary pools. As is the situation with grain growers in the wheat pools, a permit book procedure will be adopted so that those who join the voluntary pools will continue to remain in them. This is to ensure that farmers will not quickly pull out of such pooling arrangements. No farmer, however, is required to join a pool if he does not wish to do so. A pool is convenient for those farmers who find it difficult to arrange for the selling of this oil seed and would opt for the average price throughout the year, but they are obliged to stay with that pooling until the end of the crop year.

We on this side of the house consider that Bill C-34 is a good piece of enabling legislation. We approve it in principle. It meets the demand of those who believe that compulsory pooling is sound, and it meets the demand of the farmers who want some freedom of choice when they buy and sell and thus are able to take advantage of a voluntary pool. This amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act broadens the activities of the Wheat Board in conformity with the wishes of the majority of the farmers in western Canada. Wheat is kept as a compulsory pool, but other grains and oil seeds may be marketed through voluntary pools or on a cash basis.

Since Bill C-34 provides for a new arrangement for farmers, it will add to the complexity of marketing rapeseed and non-board grains. Privately-operated pools of large grain companies, some international ones, will probably be set up if profits can be realized. Such pools would compete with a government agency. If the federal government guarantees 90 per cent of the losses of such privately-owned pools, there appears to be a conflict of interest. Here an explanation is needed.

I understand that the Wheat Board could, and probably will, form a voluntary pool for rapeseed. Competition will likely come from private bodies who could establish their own marketing plans. Let us look at clause 35.11(1), which reads as follows:

● (2100)

Any association representing a significant number of producers engaged in the production of grain or any association or firm engaged in the processing or marketing of grain in interprovincial or export trade may submit to the Minister for his review and recommendation to the Governor in Council a written proposal for the establishment of a marketing plan.

The recommendation of the minister is then submitted to the Governor in Council, where, apparently the final decision is made. This is found in clause 35.12, which is as follows:

The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Minister, make an order

(a) establishing a marketing plan for the purposes of this Part if he is satisfied that a sufficient number of producers of the grain in relation to which the plan is to operate are in favour of the establishment of the plan and that the marketing of the grain through the plan will benefit the producers participating therein:

There is nothing in the bill that defines an association which could engage in the marketing of grain. In this case, the minister and the Governor in Council are invested with tremendous power, as they make the final decision regarding any association of rapeseed producers, processing firms or marketing agencies which could establish a pool. What is meant by "a significant number" in the case of the minister, and "a sufficient number" in the case of the Governor in Council? This is another example of government resorting to regulations to which legislators do not have access at the time of the passing of legislation. I hope that some light will be shed on this matter in committee.

Human nature often takes its course and many farmers will go for the highest price. A rapeseed grower who selects a voluntary pool may be happy at the beginning of the year when he receives the initial payment. It may be a different matter when later in the year the price goes considerably higher than what he would expect to receive for his pool; he might then want to sell on the open market. This could lead to what is called "bootlegging." Two or more farmers could make secret agreements among themselves so that some would join the pool and others would not. When a higher price could be realized outside the pool, the farmer contracted to the pool could have his grain sold by a farmer who is not a member of the pool. Of course, if they are caught, such farmers, according to this bill, would face charges under the Canadian Wheat Board Act and not in civil suits. Can an efficient inspecting system be operated across the prairies to arraign bootleggers of rapeseed? This matter should be discussed in committee.

Honourable senators, I have presented some questions about the administration of this legislation. There undoubtedly will be others coming from members of this chamber who are involved in agriculture and more knowledgeable in this matter than I. Senator Olson has indicated that we study Bill C-34 more fully in committee. I think that it would be appropriate and advisable to do so.

I believe that this bill goes a long way toward meeting the desires and needs of rapeseed farmers, who have expressed their views in a democratic manner, through various agricultural organizations and agencies. Although the principles of the bill appear to be good, we cannot be sure that they will work perfectly, as it is difficult to foresee all the problems that may arise with this new pooling arrangement. The bill offers an experimental solution, and it now remains with the farmers to make the scheme work in their best interests and for the good of the country.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

CANADA LANDS SURVEYS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel Riley moved the second reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I thank you for the honour of permitting me to make a few remarks on Bill C-4 prior to the motion being put on second reading.

Although the bill has 42 clauses, including the proclamation clause, most of them deal with purely housekeeping matters. However, there are one or two items which some honourable senators might question. One is the fact that when the Canada

Lands Surveys Act was passed in 1952 the designation of surveyor was retained as "Dominion land surveyor." The bill provides that the name of a surveyor who holds a commission be changed to "Canada Lands Surveyor."

A similar amendment applies to public lands. Lands which were designated as public lands within the authority of the Canada Lands Surveys Act will be designated, if the bill is passed, as "Canada Lands". The authority of the act will encompass not only cartographical surveys but also, because of the extensive technological changes brought about by exploration for gas and oil off the continental shelf, the qualification of surveyor under the act is widened in that he will now be called, if the bill passes, a Canada Lands Surveyor.

Another point taken into consideration by the amendment is that the old system of quadrilateral township lands, a system of township subdivision, which was continued under the present act, has been found, over the past 20 years, to be inappropriate to many of the areas dealt with by the act, particularly the northern parts of the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Accordingly, in the early 1950's the government adopted the policy of no longer laying out quadrilateral townships in territorial land. It is a fairly easy thing to do on the prairies and the foothills, where the land is flat or rolling, but when we come to the mountainous terrain of most of the northern territories, with their large chasms and deep valleys, and so forth, the quadrilateral township system is practically impossible to follow. This bill deletes the clauses from the Canada Lands Surveys Act that prescribed the quadrilateral system of laying out townships.

The bill also seeks to delete the definition of the word "candidate" as it exists under the present act. Previously a candidate was a person who applied for a Dominion Land Surveys commission or certificate, and who was generally somebody who had training and experience in the field. However, because of the advanced technology being used in surveying today, the need for a wider range of education arising from the oceanographic aspects of the subject having to do with the continental shelf, and other advanced methods in the technology of surveying, most of the candidates, as they are now called, go to college or university where they get either a degree in land surveying or in engineering with emphasis on surveying. Several universities and colleges in Canada give such courses of study and grant degrees. Other colleges simply offer training in the up-to-date or modern technology of surveying.

The bill will also allow experts from the hydrographic, geodetic and photometric fields to join the conventional land survey experts in setting appropriate standards for the commissioning of crown land surveys.

Certain amendments deal with penalties, and I refer particularly to those concerning monuments. A land surveyor's monument, as I am sure you all know, is usually a steel rod placed in the ground with a plate on top of it and some form of identification. They are not made of concrete; they are, as I say, merely rods, and they are not set very firmly in the ground, perhaps, in most cases, though in the northern tundra they are put into the ground to a depth of about 36 inches. Under the present act, if someone moves one of these monuments, intentionally or mischievously, they are subject to severe penalties. I think upon conviction the maximum penalty is about seven years' imprisonment. The bill before us provides for penalties on conviction, as before, but in addition provides for the offender being made liable for the cost of replacing such monuments, which is only fair. In cities, when bulldozers are digging up streets without going to the utility companies to find out where underground cables are, damage is frequently done which can result in whole telephone exchanges, electrical cables, watermains and the like, being put out of commission for hours, and even days. As you probably know, such offenders are being made liable for the cost of repairing such damage, and should perhaps also be made liable for the cost of the inconvenience they cause. Similarly, those who are found guilty of moving surveyors' monuments can also be made liable to pay the costs, which sometimes are considerable.

In addition to the amendments dealing with those who intentionally disturb or remove surveyors' monuments, or are caught in possession of them, there is an additional amendment regarding those who move them unknowingly and unintentionally. Such people can also be penalized to the extent of paying the costs for replacing the monuments.

These are not exactly earth-shaking amendments; they are mostly minor administrative ones that are absolutely needed.

As you know, honourable senators, from having read Hansard of the other place, this bill went through second reading, committee of the whole and third reading on June 14. There were few objections, and those that were made, I think, were generally minor and were not pressed. The bill went through in the one day and came to us on that same day, namely, June 14.

If there are any questions which in my infinite wisdom I may be able to answer, I shall be pleased to make the attempt. I can probably answer only 95 per cent of the technological questions, and if I cannot answer the others I know you will bear with me with your usual patience.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Haig, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL UNITY

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Croll).

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Honourable Senator Croll, I wonder if I might be allowed to take part in this debate at this stage.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, first of all I should like to say that in my opinion the speeches which have previously been made in this debate have been of outstanding quality. I think that is true without exception. It would be invidious to pick out any particular ones as having made a greater contribution than others, and it would be, I think, not only invidious but unfair, because they have all been, to my mind, of a very high standard. I have not been able to hear all of them, actually, but those that I have not heard I have read with diligence and assiduity, and that is my considered opinion. I trust that I shall not lower the tone of the debate by some of the things that I am going to say.

There are really just two main points that I want to deal with tonight. One of these is the question of the Dene nation, on which I think Senator Austin had something to say. I read with great care the Dene declaration and the proposed agreement between the Dene and the Government of Canada, and while I have the utmost sympathy with the native peoples, and while I have said on more than one occasion that I think it is possible that in due course a Dene province might be created, with a constitution, perhaps, in many respects, different from the normal provincial constitution, possibly with certain special powers, nevertheless, it seems to me that anything of the sort would have to be worked out by a process of careful and probably rather prolonged negotiation, and I cannot believe that any government or any political party would accept the kind of document which the Dene people have included as a draft agreement between the Dene and the Government of Canada. I want to draw attention to certain features of this because I think it is very important in the light of the growing assertion, and very proper assertion, by the native peoples of their rights in this country. I think it is very important to get certain things perfectly clear, and not commit ourselves to propositions which, to my mind, are quite impossible.

If you look at that proposed agreement, you will find that it sets forth, first of all, the right of the Dene to "self-determination as a nation." This is something that the government is asked to sign its agreement to. Well, as it stands, it seems to me that this would commit the Government of Canada to acknowledging the right of the Dene to secede from Canada. I know they say that they have no intention of doing this. Nonetheless, if the Government of Canada signed a document like this, then the Dene would be able to secede at any moment they chose, and I cannot imagine any government, or indeed any political party in Canada, accepting that.

In the second place, the proposed agreement states that the Dene would have "a special status," and I quote precisely, "under the Constitution of Canada." Well, that seems to me so vague that it might mean almost anything. I can't imagine that any government or a political party would accept anything as woolly as that.

In the third place, the proposed agreement states, and I quote again, "The Dene should have the right to retain ownership of so much of their traditional lands and under such terms as to ensure their independence and self-reliance traditionally, economically and socially." And here is a very splendid one, "... and the maintenance of whatever other rights they have, whether specified in this agreement, or not." Once again, I simply cannot imagine any government or any political party accepting that.

Then comes this:

The Dene government would have jurisdiction over a geographical area, and over subject matters now within the jurisdiction of either the Government of Canada, or the Government of the Northwest Territories.

Here is another blank cheque. Can anyone imagine any Government of Canada agreeing the Dene would have jurisdiction over a geographical area, unspecified, which might include a relatively small part of the Yukon, or the Northwest Territories, or both, or the whole of both Territories, clear up to the North Pole? Can anyone imagine any Government of Canada agreeing that the Dene government should have jurisdiction over subject matters totally unspecified, and I quote again, "now within the jurisdiction of either the Government of Canada, or the Government of the Northwest Territories"? This could cover the whole of section 91 of the British North America Act, some provisions of section 93, some of section 94, and some provisions of section 95. I cannot see any Canadian government buying a pig in a poke. I think any Canadian government, in any agreement arrived at for the basic purposes the Dene have in mind, would insist on knowing what specific territory is involved and what specific powers. I think that applies specifically to the phrase, "subject matters now within the jurisdiction of the Government of Canada."

That is all I want to say about the Dene proposals.

Now I want to turn to the general question raised by Senator Stanbury's speech the other day, in which he commented at great length, and in most admirable fashion, on the widespread ignorance of Canadian history. He had found this among all sorts of people. I think he cited a bank teller and some other—what was it? I have forgotten now. It was a newsboy, or something of this sort. Anyway, people of, shall we say, not very superior education, perhaps; not what we call in French "une formation supérieure". I suppose it is not very surprising that a good many ordinary citizens—and I do not mean to cast any reflections on them—but people who have not pursued any advanced studies in these matters should be relatively ignorant of some of these things. It is a little daunting to find that people don't know there is a Senate and don't know that certain things are so about certain of our institutions, notably this one. But, on the other hand, I can, to some extent, excuse that when you are dealing with people of the relatively unadvanced level of education of those that I think Senator Stanbury referred to.

Unfortunately, that is not, by any means, the whole of it. It goes far beyond that; and, of course, the basic cause is exactly what Senator Stanbury said, the invasion of our educational systems, certainly in the English language provinces, by the American experts of progressive education—the educational administrators, the people who were scorched and burned by the late Professor Hilda Neatby in her admirable book, So Little for the Mind. If any of you haven't read that book, and want to see a thorough exposure of the charlatanism and the humbug of a lot of this professional educational theory, you have a treat in store for you. It is written in absolutely inimitable style. It is superb. It is based on most thorough investigation. The only thing that is wrong with it, as I told Professor Neatby at the time, is that it doesn't go far enough, because she could have applied much the same to a good deal of the teaching in some Canadian universities. I speak particularly there of departments of political science—my own special subject—where, in sadly too many cases, the people who are doing the teaching have very little knowledge of Canadian history and very little knowledge of Canadian law. I can substantiate that; and I think, if I have time, I may do so in some detail shortly. Both of those seem to me to be serious gaps in the equipment of any political scientist undertaking to write about the Government of Canada—or to lecture about it.

I shall return to that in a moment. I merely want to give certain examples now of the kind of thing that one runs into among people who certainly ought to know more. First of all, some years ago, I was fortuitously—simply because better qualified people happened not to be available that day—asked to sit on a board examining candidates for the position of archival assistant. We had, I think, four or five of them. One of them had majored in history a couple of years before at a Canadian university of repute. Another one, a couple of years before, had been teaching grade 13 Canadian history. She was the best of the lot. The first one that I mention was asked about the Pacific scandal. This was a university graduate who had majored in Canadian history. She was asked about the Pacific scandal. After prolonged consultation of the cement floor—they all appeared to regard that as an oracle, a source of wisdom—after prolonged consultation of the cement floor, she said, "Well, it had something to do with the relations between government and business." We said, "Yes. And can you tell us anything more about it?" Further prolonged consultation of the oracle—"Well, it had something to do with a railway," I think she said. We said, "Yes". Then somebody said, "Can you tell us who was Prime Minister at the time?" She looked at the floor for a long time, and then in a slightly interrogative tone, said, "Mackenzie King?"

Then we had this other one, who was the best of the lot, and she prefaced most of her remarks with, "As an historian . . ." very grand, indeed, and exceedingly condescending to the "lesser breeds, without the law" who did not have her special training and would not possess her special knowledge. So I said to her, "Mrs. So and So, could you give us the names of any of the Fathers of Confederation?" Prolonged cogitation, consultation with the floor, and then—

Senator Bourget: Forsey!

Senator Forsey:—"Macdonald." I said, "Yes, can you give us any other?" And she said, "Brown." And I said, "Yes." "Can you name any Father of Confederation from Nova Scotia?" And imagine, honourable senators, the horror of my part-Nova Scotian heart when she said, "Tilley." Well, I took a deep breath, and I said, "Can you give us the name of any Father of Confederation from Canada East, what we now call Quebec?" After very prolonged cogitation, she said, "Lafontaine." I said, "Mrs. So and So, I have no further questions to ask." You may say that that is perhaps not too much to go on.

● (2130)

Let me give you another illustration. My friend Dr. Graham Spry has a daughter who in the last decade was very deeply involved in the student activist movements of that time. One evening Dr. Spry invited a number of her friends, including the then president of the Federation of Canadian Students—I have forgotten its precise title—a gentleman I have since come to know, who is a person of real ability—he invited them to come to his house and spend an evening chatting and got them on to the subject of Canadian history. They knew all about Mississippi; they knew all about Baltimore; they knew all about Detroit; they knew all about Los Angeles; they knew all about the struggle for civil rights in the United States. "But," he said, "You will scarcely believe this, but this is the literal, precise truth. Not one of them had ever heard of the Progressive Party; not one of them had ever heard of the wheat pools; not one of them had ever heard of the Winnipeg Strike; not one of them had ever heard the name of J. S. Woodsworth, and they were staggered and delighted to discover that there was a Canadian radical tradition."

Some honourable senators may say that if they did not know about these dangerous and subversive movements and characters it might be all to the good. But I think most of us will say that, even if these things were all thoroughly reprehensible, it was desirable that Canadian university students should have some idea that they existed. They couldn't even fight that kind of thing effectively if they didn't know it was there. There is another example.

Some years ago I noticed in Le Devoir an article by a former minister in the cabinet here, who had retired, about the powers of the Senate, and he calmly announced—and he was a former professor at a very well-known university in Quebec—that if the Senate turned down something twice it could be re-passed by the House of Commons and would then go through without the assent of the Senate, that it would become law. He was apparently under the impression that there existed in this country something like the British Parliament Act. I immediately wrote a letter to Le Devoir, in the best French that I could muster, pointing out that he was completely wrong.

Of course, when I point out factual mistakes of this sort I very often have people saying to me, "Well, of course, you hold very strong opinions" which always irritates me to the point of madness. What on earth have my opinions got to do with it? Either the Senate has a certain power or it hasn't. Or else they say, "Well, there are two sides to every question." I get this even from academic persons, who of all people ought to know better. The point being, of course, there are certain things that aren't questions. If somebody says to me, "Those glasses of yours are an elephant," I reply, "My dear sir, that is not a question to which there are two sides. You are just plain wrong. You are probably crazy if you think they are an elephant."

Those are pretty bad, but then honourable senators will recall, perhaps, that when we were discussing the second report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments I called attention, perhaps at undue length, to the fact that a large number of the lawyers in the government service were totally ignorant of the basic developments in English constitutional law, which is part of our constitutional law, in the English seventeenth century. They had never heard of the Bill of Rights of 1689. They had never heard of the abolition of the dispensing power, which they were purporting to exercise. They even had the crust to say initially that the English Bill of Rights was not part of the law of Canada. As I think I mentioned at the time, they climbed half way down from that. One very distinguished lawyer—I am ashamed to mention who it was, but you can find it in our proceedings—described our comments on the abolition of the dispensing power as a novel legal theory.

There is just one other thing I want to say about this particular aspect. Some of you may have noticed in the columns of the Globe and Mail recently some discussion of the so-called reforms being introduced in the teaching of history in Ontario schools. I hope you saw the three scorching letters which appeared in the Globe and Mail on that subject, one from Mr. John Palmer, Head of the History Department of the Orillia Collegiate, a gentleman whom I have known for some time, who is extraordinarily competent in his field, one from the Curriculum and Standards Committee and the Lawrence Park Parents' Association, and one, perhaps the most scathing of all, from several members of the Department of History at the University of Toronto, notably Professor Maurice Careless, whose qualifications no one with even my slight knowledge of Canadian history would venture to question for a moment.

I might read just one or two pithy sentences from two of these letters. I am sorry that I have temporarily mislaid Professor Careless' letter and cannot give quotations from that, but here is what the Lawrence Park Curriculum and Standards Committee said about the new proposals:

Whole areas of our history are ignored: industrialism—Something of an omission, that:

the First and Second World Wars and the War of 1812 never appear. British history, in which lie the roots of many of our Canadian institutions, is given one-eighth of one year.

They say further:

The result is a most fragmented and incomplete view of historical causation, which will leave our students in ignorance of the revolution—

It should be "evolution" I think.

—of the legal, political and economic processes of this country. It may well be that a course in civics and social responsibility has merit, but if so, it should be introduced under its own name, and certainly be no more than one year in length.

They say they appealed to the provincial Minister of Education, and the reply from the ministry:

... entirely failed to address itself to our major concerns. In the face of the indifference of the minister to our representations, and to the views of leading historians, we should like to suggest that this is a serious issue requiring the active attention of your educational writers and of all those who care about the education of our children. The calculated sacrifice of the academic discipline of history does no credit to this ministry, and robs youngsters all over the province of a great part of the sound education for which Ontario has always been noted.

Mr. Palmer says:

... no contact was made, as far as I have been able to ascertain, with a major university's history department—

In preparing this new curriculum:

The proposed guideline was totally unknown to both Toronto and Queen's universities' history departments when I brought it to their attention.

He says:

Whether the theorists like it or not, what they have produced is not history but an unsavory amalgam which is primarily sociology. It follows no recognized path, except political expediency, and it has no principles, except pandering to every current ideology.

I have read the documents in question—Mr. Palmer sent them to me—and they are a terrible mishmash of gobbledygook and the worst kind of half-baked American sociological jargon. And I can't perhaps be more unpleasant than that in my comments.

I want to say just something also about some of my fellow Canadian political scientists. Some of you may have read in a recent issue of Maclean's magazine an article by Professor Verney—a distinguished member of the fraternity, I might say—saying that the solution to the problem of national unity was to get back to the double majority principle which prevailed in the pre-Confederation Province of Canada. Well, every single statement that Professor Verney made in that article is demonstrably untrue. I have no doubt for a moment that he believed them to be true, but he just doesn't know. The double majority principle, of course, never did prevail in the Province of Canada. It was the pet idea of Sandfield Macdonald and it was never adopted, it was never followed. It was twice explicitly repudiated, in 1856 and 1858, by the legislature by vote. It was conspicuously not followed, of course, in the measure which imposed separate schools on the Province of Ontario against the wishes of the majority of the members from the Canada West section of the old Province of Canada. Perhaps that was a good thing, but it certainly was not an illustration of the double majority principle.

Of course, to talk of going back to the double majority principle may make some kind of sense to the people of the two central provinces, but it makes absolutely no sense to the people of the maritime provinces, who never had anything to do with this, even with Sandfield Macdonald's pet idea. It makes absolutely no sense to the people of Newfoundland. It makes absolutely no sense to the people of the western provinces. It is an illustration of what my wife sometimes calls "the Torontocentric view of the universe," the idea that Ontario, or at best central Canada, is the whole of Canada. Well, this is something which those of us who come from the Atlantic provinces and, I think, also those who come from the west, find very distasteful, very inadequate and, indeed, repugnant to our sense of what Canada means.

I might add that I sent a scathing—perhaps I am using that word too often, but I think it is appropriate in this case—I sent a sober and factual reply, I was about to say—almost exactly the same length as Professor Verney's article to Maclean's magazine and I received a letter from one of the editors, or their staff, some lesser personage than the editor, saying that my letter had been received with great interest and had caused some discussion and, space permitting, they proposed to print an excerpt from it in a forthcoming issue. I wrote back a letter saying I was astounded that they had the immortal crust and rind to suggest that they would print an excerpt. I said: "Either you will print the whole thing, or nothing; I don't care which, but I absolutely forbid you to print an excerpt." Because I knew what would happen; I feel absolutely certain of what would happen. They would pick out the concluding sentences of the thing, leaving out all the evidence with which I demolished Professor Verney's article and just put in the final literary flourish with which I rounded the thing off and it would have no real effect whatsoever. I don't know what result there will be from this, but it infuriated me to find this proposal to mangle what I had sent to them in the way of a careful, factual repudiation of the utterly ignorant statements which Professor Verney had made.

One other illustration is that a year or so ago there appeared a book on Canadian federalism and in this case I shan't mention the author; perhaps I should not have mentioned Professor Verney, but it would have been difficult to discuss the thing without mentioning him. However, in this case the whole book—and I naturally was very much interested—was full of the most grotesque factual errors, straight factual errors, not a matter of opinion at all. He discussed for example, section 92(10)(c) of the British North America Act. He made four statements about it, every single one of which was wrong, just factually, plain wrong. For instance, he said it had been used only a very few times, whereas Professor Andrée Lajoie of the University of Montreal has catalogued 470 cases, I think it is, something close to that anyway, in which it has been used. He said that it provided for the taking over of public works. Well, of course it doesn't provide for the taking over of anything and it doesn't deal with public works. He muddled up the distinction between works and undertakings, just absolutely vital to the consideration of the matter. The whole thing was a complete mishmash.

I might add that in many instances his footnotes giving references were totally irrelevant to the matters which he was discussing. He discussed the jurisdiction over broadcasting; I've forgotten what he attributed that to, but it certainly had no relation at all to the actual basis of the jurisdiction. He quoted a legal case in the footnotes which contained not one syllable to the effect of what he said above.

It was a grotesque performance and I might add that he committed what was to me the unforgivable, the unpardonable, the incredible sin, to me, brought up in the old conservative tradition—not the Progressive Conservative tradition, the old conservative tradition—of confusing John Sandfield Macdonald and John A. Macdonald. Well, you can't go beyond that for ignorance of Canadian history.

I want to turn to one other point before taking my seat and I am sorry for delaying honourable senators so long. Not only is there a great deal of ignorance of Canadian history, there are a large number of fantastic fairy tales about Canadian history which are widely believed and I want to mention just two or three of them here.

The other day, June 7, to be exact, there appeared in the Montreal Gazette an article by the present Minister of Culture, I think he is, in the Government of Quebec, the Hon. Dr. Laurin, in the course of which he made the statement—and I'm going to pick up the letter I sent to the editor on the subject, which has the exact quotation—he made the statement that "Manitoba in 1890 abolished with a stroke of the pen the French school system." Well, I have no doubt that Dr. Laurin believes this to be true, but it is simply not so. I think it is very widely believed in the province of Quebec, but it is simply not so. There are only three acts passed by the Legislature of Manitoba in 1890 which by any stretch of the imagination can be considered relevant. The first was the one which said that so far as the jurisdiction of the legislature extended—this is being challenged in the courts and I think the challenge will probably be successful; I hope so—which said that henceforth, so far as the jurisdiction of the legislature extended, English should be the sole language of the legislature and the courts in Manitoba. Not one syllable, not so much as a comma, about education or schools in any way, shape, or form. So that disposes of that act.

There were two other acts, the Public Schools Act and the Education Act. I had the advantage of seeing a learned memorandum by Professor Rothney, professor of Canadian history at the University of Manitoba, which appeared in French in Le Devoir, at the time of the decision by Chief Justice Deschênes on the validity of certain sections of Bill 22. I checked carefully myself in the Parliamentary Library on the contents of the Manitoba Education Act and the Manitoba Public Schools Act of 1890 and I found that Professor Rothney was perfectly correct in saying that neither of them had one single syllable about the language of education, the language in the schools. That remained after those two acts of 1890 in exactly the position it had been in before, namely within the jurisdiction of the local school boards; not one syllable to change that.

Furthermore, of course, as he pointed out, by the Laurier-Greenway compromise of 1897 the French language in the educational system of Manitoba was given for the first time an explicit blanket guarantee, which I think disappeared later—my recollection is somewhere around 1916—and has now been restored, at least to a large degree, fairly recently by the legislation introduced by the Honourable Duff Roblin. So there, you see, you have a complete fairy tale, widely believed, widely spread and, I dare say, widely accepted by the readers of Dr. Laurin's article; they wouldn't know any better.

Then you find, also, that in that same article Dr. Laurin says that the other provinces have made themselves, or "have become"—I'm quoting somebody else when I say "have made themselves"—"have become unilingually English." Well, that is, to say the least, highly misleading. Manitoba started out bilingual and made itself unilingually English, or tried to do it. It remains to be seen whether or not the official language Act of 1890 was valid. I think not, and I suspect and hope that the courts will so find. But if you take the provinces other than Quebec, which one of them was ever bilingual? Which one of them said at some point in its history: "We have been bilingual. Go to; we shall now become unilingually English"? Not one.

Ontario started off unilingually English and for an excellent reason. In the census of 1861, the last before Confederation, the population of French birth or origin in the province of Ontario was 2.6 per cent of the whole. Ontario started off unilingually English; it has remained unilingually English until fairly recently, until the last 15 years, or so, I suppose you might say, when there has been a definite move notably in the educational system to extend the rights of Franco-Ontarians. Now, I admit that part-way through Ontario did at one point say "The schools shall be unilingually English," with very slight qualifications. That was the famous, the infamous regulation 17. But regulation 17 disappeared 50 years ago and in recent years there has taken place, certainly in Ontario education, what Dr. Symons, the former president of Trent University, calls the "Ontario quiet revolution."

The number of pupils in French language public schools in Ontario is now in the neighbourhood of 100,000. I had exact figures for a couple of years ago and I have seen subsequent figures which have shown 106,000, but I wouldn't take my oath on that; certainly it is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 100,000. Well, I can say with absolute certainty that if 25 or 30 years ago any government in Ontario had done for French education what Robarts and Davis have done, that government would have been out of office in 24 hours. There has been an enormous change in public attitude; this thing went through with scarcely a murmur. I don't think there was a vote against it in the legislative assembly. A few people absented themselves; some fusty old mossbacks and dinosaurs absented themselves. I do not think there was one single vote against it.

I admit that there are particular cases where there have been difficulties, yes, and there are particular cases still awaiting solution, but an enormous change has taken place. A great many more services are being provided for Franco-Ontarians in French now. There is a long distance to go. But even in the courts, where I think the thing is most difficult, for a variety of reasons, a beginning has been made recently here, I think, and in Sudbury, if I am correctly informed. Of course, the problem is an enormous one, because the whole of the jurisprudence of the province of Ontario—and in civil law, it is case law jurisprudence, which complicates the problem—is in English, and the whole of the legal education system in Ontario, to the best of my belief, has, until now, been in English. So that the problem of changing over to a bilingual court system in the parts of the province where there are large French-language minorities is not something you can accomplish overnight. In Quebec it has been built up over a couple of centuries. You had an enormous apparatus of official bilingualism in place at Confederation. You did not have that in Ontario.

Dealing with New Brunswick: New Brunswick, of course, started off as a unilingual English province but, thanks to the legislation started by the Honourable Senator Robichaud, it became gradually, over a relatively short period, officially bilingual. The whole of the New Brunswick Official Languages Act has now been proclaimed. I do not say that there are no problems left, but an enormous change has taken place and, once again, it has taken place with relatively little opposition—to one of my years, astonishingly little opposition.

At Confederation, the probability is that the French-language population in New Brunswick made up about 15 per cent of the total. The first figures we have are for 1871 when it was 17 per cent, and I have no reason to suppose that it was very much more—it was probably rather less, actually—at Confederation. But it was something of that order of magnitude.

In Prince Edward Island, we have no figures until 1881, and the figure then, I think, was somewhere in the neighbourhood of 11 per cent. The probability is that at Confederation it was somewhere near the same level.

I cannot imagine that in Newfoundland the French-speaking population was ever more than a very small fraction of the total population—at Confederation, at all events, and, I think, since. When British Columbia's turn came, of course, I fancy you could have scoured British Columbia with a fine tooth comb to find a French-speaking person.

My point is that at that time, at Confederation, in most of the provinces, except, perhaps, New Brunswick, the French-language minority was small. Even in New Brunswick it had been jumped on with hobnailed boots by its Irish co-religionists so that its political importance was exceedingly small; its political power was exceedingly small. In the other provinces, you simply did not have the conditions of official bilingualism. Even if it had been proposed at the time of Confederation—which, from all of the documents I can discover, nobody even thought of—I think there is little question that most, if not all, of the delegates from Canada West, and all of the delegates from the maritime provinces and Newfoundland would have said, "Well, it is completely unnecessary and completely impracticable."

What is necessary and desirable and right now, in very different conditions, when French Canadians have spread out, notably into Ontario and into New Brunswick, was not necessarily right and necessary and desirable in 1867, and I think that fact has to be recognized.

That brings me to another notion which appears to be widely spread in Quebec, namely that at Confederation there was some kind of bargain struck between the English-speaking and the French-speaking which provided for linguistic equality all the way across the country. Well, that is simply not so. The bargain that was struck on this matter is contained in section 133 of the British North American Act, and it was sufficient for that particular day when, in the first place, French Canada meant, for all practical purposes Quebec; it was sufficient for that particular day when the sphere of government was very restricted; it was sufficient for that particular day when, on the whole, the French Canadian population was not, I think it safe to say, terribly interested in economic matters, and was mainly concerned with preserving its traditional rights, its traditional civilization—its schools, its civil law, the use of its language in official matters, and that sort of thing—a very different situation from that which has prevailed in Quebec since the beginning of the Quiet Revolution. If anybody accuses the English-speaking people of having gone back on a bargain struck at Confederation for complete linguistic equality across the country, I should very much like to see the evidence for it. I have gone through the Confederation Debates several times with great care and I have totally failed to find anything of the sort.

I have here on my desk at this moment a pamphlet issued by the Honourable Joseph Cauchon just before the Confederation agreement went into effect. In a pamphlet of 154 pages, he had rather less than one page on the question of bilingualism, and he makes it perfectly clear that what was in question was official bilingualism in Quebec and in the Parliament of Canada. He does not mention the courts. He should have. He says that it didn't even require a particular argument. Everybody recognized it. There was no argument, no opposition, no difficulty; nothing at all about any question of official bilingualism in the other provinces.

These are perhaps what have been called sometimes in French "dures vérités," hard truths, but I think they need to be asserted, and I have done so without fear or favour, because sometimes now I think the progress of bilingualism and biculturalism, of which I am a firm and unrepentant partisan and supporter, is being hindered by allegations that we English-speaking people have "done the dirty" in this matter on our French Canadian fellow citizens; that we made a bargain and have not lived up to it. I do not think that is true, and I do not think it is a good way of getting extra support for the policy, which I believe in. On the whole, I think it is better to say to people, "Look, you did not do very well for a while, and it is understandable. There were difficulties. You have been doing some good things recently. There is an awful lot more to do. Get on with it; hurry up; finish the job."

But if you start off by saying, "You blankety-blank skunks, you miserable, unmentionable, unspeakable scoundrels, you made a bargain in 1867 and you have welshed on it," I do not think that is the way to get support. I do not think it is the way to win friends and influence people, and I want to see friends won for bilingualism and biculturalism; I want to see friends won for linguistic equality. I want to see people influenced in that direction. I do not think it is a good way to go at it by hitting us on the nose and saying, "Take that, you skunks. Now then, now we are asking you to do something for us." That is not the kind of thing that appeals to me. I am no psychologist, and perhaps I am a very curious, bad-tempered Newfoundlander, but I suspect that there are other people who feel the same way.

I want to add just one other thing. There is a good deal of talk now to the effect that the English-speaking minority in Quebec—and I speak as one who was a member of it for 16 years, two of whose grandparents were members of it and four of whose great grandparents were members of it—there is a good deal of talk to the effect that the English-speaking minority in Quebec grabbed the whole economic life of Quebec, kicked the French out of it, or kept them out of it, hogged the whole thing. I am inclined to think that that is rather overdoing it; rather exaggerating. I don't want to oversimplify it, but I think it is reasonably safe to say that, until relatively recent times, the bulk of French Canadian people were not terribly interested in business and commerce and finance. I know there are exceptions, yes, but it is not as if you had at the conquest, or at some later date—in 1840 or in 1867—a French Canadian business community and the English-speaking people had come along and given it "un grand coup de pied," a great kick in the seat of the trousers, and said, "Get out; there is no place for you here. This is our business. We are hogging it."

I think it is much nearer the truth to say that there was something of a vacuum; that, on the whole, the French Canadian civilization was a rural, an agricultural, a traditional civilization, whose education, until relatively recent times, tended to concentrate upon the classical colleges, the preparation for the learned professions, and that the interest in economic affairs was relatively small. You had a mystique about the apostolic vocation of the French Canadian people to bring the rest of North America, including Roman Catholics who were not of French origin, to the light of the true faith. I have heard speeches on this by leading proponents of the theory who were well thought of and well established. I have read theses in which the authors, graduates of French language universities, quoted with warm approval the attitude of bishops who said, "Our people, bent over their toil from dawn to dusk, asking no luxury, not wanting high wages, not wanting shorter hours, ah, how noble they are! Not like the wicked, moneygrubbing, mercenary English who think about these wretched things of this world instead of concentrating on the world beyond."

This is a picturesque way of putting it. There is some exaggeration in it, perhaps, but I think there is something in it. I think one example of the kind of attitude that prevailed until relatively recently is that when Mr. Mackenzie King was forming his government in 1921, he offered the portfolio of Trade and Commerce to Sir Lomer Gouin who was much closer to the business establishment in Quebec than a good many of his contemporaries, and Sir Lomer would not look at it. He wanted the Department of Justice. If anybody thinks I am making this up, go down to the Library, hunt up Professor Fred Gibson's study of the formation of the cabinets since Confederation and you will find the thing there with chapter and verse fully documented. I think that is a bit symptomatic.

Now, with the quiet revolution, and, to some extent, before, the whole face of things changed, and thank God it did. It was high time. And I dare say that the "English" establishment—the English-speaking establishment—in Quebec has been anxious to hang on to privileges, yes. Capitalists will be capitalists, employers will be employers, bankers will be bankers. None of them likes to give up power that they have. But I think it is unfair to suggest, as is often suggested, by implication at least, that the dirty English-speaking minority in Quebec simply hogged the whole economic life of the province and kept French Canadians out deliberately. I think this is an over-statement and I think it is unfortunate that so much is being said now is in the form of accusations of this sort whose foundation is, to my mind, exceedingly dubious.

Now, I don't suppose I have added to my popularity in any quarter of the house by what I have said tonight. I thought it necessary to say it, otherwise I should not have done it. I still think it necessary. I am perfectly willing to accept correction on points where I have been wrong, not to say that "other people have very strong views," or "that there are two sides to every question," or something of that sort. If somebody can show me the evidence for the statements, the fairy tales as I call them, the theories or the myths which I have been girding at, I shall be delighted to don a white sheet and repent in sackcloth and ashes. But I want to see the evidence. In this respect I might say that I am from Missouri and the mere fact that some highly placed person, even a glorious being who sits in the provincial cabinet of Quebec, has made a statement is not going to persuade me that this is infallible truth.

I want to end on one more positive and encouraging note. Senator Stanbury spoke of some of the things that have been done to promote understanding across the country, and I was delighted to hear him mention them. I should like also to mention one other with which I think most members of the house are acquainted and which, I think, deserves to have its merits and achievements briefly recorded in our Hansard. That is the Forum for Young Canadians which, in fact, at this moment is conducting its work in Ottawa. To those of you who are not familiar with it I may say that four times a year it brings senior high school pupils, 16 to 18 years of age, from all across the country here, and gives them a one-week pretty intensive course in the political institutions of this country. It gets them from all parts of the country, both languages, native peoples, people from small communities as well as large—indeed sometimes the small communities do rather better than the large ones. I might remark in passing that Ontario is apt to be the laggard and to provide a disproportionately small number of people for these things. The thing has succeeded beyond our wildest expectations. I am a trustee of it and was for a while a director. And the proof of it, I think, is that not only that it appears to us, and I think to most of the people who addressed the meetings—members of Parliament, ministers, leaders of the Opposition, officials and so forth—it appears not only to us who have taken part in the thing to have been a success, but the people who have gone through it have formed an alumni association. Some of them come back year after year to help with the thing. They come back to bear a share in making the thing go. I think this is very encouraging. I think it is, perhaps, best summed up in the letter which was sent to the directors by a couple of youngsters, one from Quebec and one from British Columbia, who shared a room. One of them said, "When I came I was a British Columbia separatist: I have gone away a Canadian." The other said in French, "When I came I was a Quebec separatist: I have gone away a Canadian."

For those of us who have at heart the unity of this country I think this is immensely encouraging. True, it is only 400 youngsters a year who come here, but I think the thing spreads out and ripples and I think it will be, perhaps, a considerable factor over the next few years in producing a change of heart in certain parts of the country, perhaps especially the west.

I think also that another encouraging feature of this whole situation is that many of the young people are very much more open and understanding than their elders have been. I have noticed this in a number of instances. I noticed it one time a few years ago in the University of Waterloo where they put on with the history department and the secondary schools of the county a simulated dominion-provincial conference, and there in the heartland of Ontario where the second language, if there is one, is German and where there are very, very few French Canadians, to my great astonishment and delight the chap who was playing the part of the Prime Minister of Canada, and the chap who was playing the part of the Prime Minister of Ontario, and the chap who was playing the part of the Prime Minister of Quebec, all spoke in both languages without notes and their French was pretty good—some accent, yes, and an occasional error, but really pretty good, and they did it with obvious enthusiasm. I remember that the boy who was taking the part of the Premier of Quebec asked the boy who was taking the part of the Premier of Ontario a question in English, and the boy who was taking the part of the Premier of Ontario replied in French to this effect: "Since my colleague from Quebec has done me the honour of asking a question in my own language, I shall reply in his." And he gave a very good impromptu reply, without a note, in French and with obvious pride and enthusiasm in being able to do so. I think this is encouraging. I think the young people of this country are showing the way to many of the rest of us in broadmindedness and openness and understanding and tolerance, and I hope very much that we shall all increasingly follow their example, even though perhaps some of you may think that tonight I have not been doing so.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Forsey will permit me to ask a question. Usually his facts match his eloquence, but tonight I would ask him if it is not true that rather than the Irish co-religionist of the French people in New Brunswick clobbering the French with their hobnailed boots, was it not, and does history not bear out the fact, that the French people in New Brunswick from the time of Confederation until recent years were exploited unmercifully, and suppressed economically and culturally, by the English-speaking—other than Irish—the English-speaking merchant princes and robber barons in the province? I think he should review his historical research and not confuse it, perhaps, with what happened in Newfoundland.

Senator Forsey: I think what Senator Riley says is correct to the best of my knowledge and belief. But what I was referring to was the kind of thing that Professor Hugh Thorburn documents in his book on the politics of New Brunswick, and the way in which it proved exceedingly difficult for the French-speaking people in New Brunswick to get their own French-speaking priests and their own French-speaking bishops. I think that in the context of what I was talking about, namely the political clout of the French in New Brunswick at the time of Confederation, this was a fact, that the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick at that time meant, for political purposes, mainly the Irish, people like the Honourable Timothy Anglin, for example, and the Irish people for whom he spoke. People like the Honourable Timothy Anglin, for example, and the Irish people for whom he spoke carried much more political weight, I think, than the Acadians did at the time. Doubtless that was partly for the reason which Senator Riley has mentioned, and I am glad that he has added his eloquent, and, to the best of my belief, highly relevant and true footnote to what I have been saying. I was merely speaking in another context.

Senator Riley: May I ask a supplementary question of Senator Forsey? He used the expression, "clobbered with hobnailed boots." If there was any kind of struggle between the Irish Catholics in New Brunswick and the French Catholics, is he fair in saying that the Irish Catholics clobbered the French Catholics with their hobnailed boots, without making some reference to the English and Scottish robber barons?

Senator Forsey: I was not talking of the economic aspect of it at all, but only of the political clout which these people had. I was basing my remarks on the pretty fully documented work which Professor Thorburn did in that book. I do not know if Senator Riley has read it, but if he has and I am wrong, I shall be glad to be informed.

Perhaps I should not have used the expression "hobnailed boots." However, the French-speaking people of New Brunswick had a good many legitimate grievances, I would judge from what Professor Thorburn has said, a good many grievances against members of the hierarchy of the church in New Brunswick. This meant that their political clout was small. When the question, for example, of the Common Schools Act of New Brunswick, 1870-71, came up, to the best of my recollection—and I have read the debates on the subject in the House of Commons several times—to the best of my recollection the emphasis throughout was on the religious aspect, and the main burden of the argument was carried by the Honourable John Costigan, who was pure Irish, to the best of my belief. It was he who got through the House of Commons the motion asking the government to disallow the Common Schools Act.

I do not think there was any French Canadian, in fact I do not know that there was even a French-speaking member from New Brunswick at the time. The whole burden of the fight for the Roman Catholic schools in New Brunswick was carried by the Irish. For that reason I do not think that the French-speaking people at that time carried much political weight.

I once went over the list of members in the provincial house at that time and in the Dominion House of Commons, and from the areas where I might have expected to find French-speaking members I was astonished to find how few there were. I have not the facts at my fingertips now, but I was astonished to find in how few cases there were any French-speaking members. And this was for districts which I should have supposed would have been returning French-speaking members.

However, I defer to Senator Riley's greater knowledge of New Brunswick history. It is highly possible that I neglected to mention something I should have mentioned. If so, I fully accept his corrections, but I still think there was something in what I said: that the political clout of the French-speaking people of New Brunswick at the time of Confederation was pretty small whereas the political clout of the Irish was rather considerable.

Senator Riley: Would the Honourable Senator Forsey then withdraw from the record his reference to the Irish clobbering the French with their hobnailed boots?

Senator Forsey: I did not use the word "clobbering." "Jumping on," I said, and I also said that that was possibly a rhetorical exaggeration. But I do not see any particular reason to withdraw the general point I was making. If Senator Riley would like me to withdraw the expression, "jumping on with hobnailed boots," I shall be delighted to do so.

Senator Riley: Thank you very much. I would also remind Senator Forsey that we have among the Irish some Paisleys in New Brunswick as well as in Northern Ireland.

Senator Forsey: I dare say. I don't know about that.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 21, 1977

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-3, to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Macnaughton: Now.

Senator Flynn: Why? Next sitting.

Senator Macnaughton: With consent now, but if there is some objection, next sitting.

Senator Flynn: Why not tomorrow? Does it make any difference?

Senator Macnaughton moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

JAMES BAY AND NORTHERN QUEBEC NATIVE CLAIMS SETTLEMENT BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which was referred Bill C-9, the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement Act, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 21, 1977

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred the Bill C-9, intituled: "An Act to approve, give effect to and declare valid certain agreements between the Grand Council of the Crees (of Quebec), the Northern Quebec Inuit Association, the Government of Quebec, la Société d'énergie de la Baie James, la Société de développement de la Baie James, la Commission hydro-électrique de Québec and the Government of Canada and certain other related agreements to which the Government of Canada is a party", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, May 24, 1977, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Your committee was very much impressed with the evidence presented to it by spokesmen for native groups who were not parties to the James Bay Agreement and is seriously concerned that sub-clause 3(3) of Bill C-9 provides, in respect of the Territory referred to in the James Bay Agreement, for the extinguishment of all native claims, rights, title and interests of all Indians and all Inuit whether or not they were parties to, or represented by parties to, the Agreement.

Your committee is also seriously concerned that the bill does not specifically provide for a right to compensation in favour of any person who was not a signatory to the Agreement and who has a valid claim relating to the Territory.

Your committee has nevertheless decided to rely on the good faith of the Government of Quebec to negotiate with such third parties, under the terms of section 2.14 of the Agreement, in order to ensure that, in any case where a valid claim is established, compensation will be accorded on the same basis as it would have been accorded had such parties been entitled to participate in the compensation and benefits of the Agreement.

Respectfully submitted,

H. CARL GOLDENBERG,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Goldenberg moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION (SCIENTIFIC ACTIVITIES) BILL, 1976

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Carter, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 21, 1977

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to which was referred Bill C-26, intituled: "An Act respecting the organization of certain scientific activities of the Government of Canada" has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, June 14, 1977, examined the said bill and now reports the same with the following amendment:

1. Page 22: Strike out lines 11 to 16 inclusive in clause 73 and substitute therefor the following:

(c) four other persons, one each representing and nominated by the Canada Council, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the National Research Council of Canada; and

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Carter moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Grosart, for Senator van Roggen, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-6, respecting Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities in Canada, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Thompson moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING NUCLEAR SUPPLIES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on May 11 Senator Grosart asked a question about the negotiations respecting nuclear supplies.

Senator Smith (Colchester): A good thing we get it back the same year.

Senator Perrault: The question was:

Could I ask the Leader of the Government what is the current status of the negotiations between Canada and other countries with which any Canadian company has a contractual commitment for nuclear supplies, particularly West Germany, Japan and Sweden?

The answer is:

As the honourable members know, in December 1976, Mr. Jamieson announced in the other house stringent conditions on transfers of nuclear material and equipment which supplemented those announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in December 1974; these provide for NPT ratification or acceptance of full-scope safeguards as a condition of supply before new contracts for supply of uranium or CANDU reactors can go forward.

Negotiations at the official level took place with the Japanese in the last month. Mr. Jamieson met with the Japanese Foreign Minister in Vancouver last week and discussed the principal issue outstanding, namely, Canadian control on Canadian material which is enriched in the U.S.A. Further official discussions will be held shortly between the U.S.A., Japan and Canada to attempt to resolve this major obstacle in the way of agreement. Shipments have been suspended since December 31, 1976, pending the conclusion of a satisfactory agreement.

Negotiations with the European Community have been continuing but at the last meeting there still remained important differences between the two sides relating to technology, reprocessing and the role of France, which is not a signatory to the NPT and therefore raises special problems. Negotiators are attempting to resolve the differences. Shipments of uranium to the Community have been suspended since December 31, 1976.

It is expected that negotiations with Switzerland will resume in the near future.

Sweden has recently met all Canadian requirements and signature of the Canada-Sweden Nuclear Cooperation Agreement is imminent.

[Later]

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may ask the leader a question, supplementary to the answer given to Senator Grosart's question. I imagine the leader might have to take this as notice.

In addition to the countries he mentioned, is it not true that Canada has a firm commitment to supply a CANDU reactor to Rumania, if not a formal contract? And is it not true that Rumania is prepared to meet all the restrictive requirements of Canada, including the requirements and inspection conditions of the NPT and the standards they impose?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, an appropriate inquiry will go forward.

Senator Flynn: Well done.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a question supplementary to the one answered a few minutes ago by the Leader of the Government respecting so-called improved control of nuclear material supplied by Canada. I would ask the Leader of the Government if this new and improved control of the use of nuclear material originating from Canada does in fact involve Canadian personnel having greater surveillance of this material, or if it is simply a matter of improved assurances from some of those countries to which we are exporting this material?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice. That particular information has not been provided as yet.

Senator Olson: As a supplementary to that, I would ask if copies of the agreements are available. If not, are they held to be not for public information?

Senator Perrault: I shall be pleased to determine the situation with respect to the agreements. If there is some way by which copies can be made available for the honourable senator to read, that avenue will also be investigated.

IMPLEMENTATION OF HELSINKI AGREEMENT—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there has been a considerable degree of concern expressed about the Helsinki Agreement. This evening I have some replies for the Honourable Senator Thompson to questions posed in the chamber on May 17. His first question was:

In view of the pending June Belgrade conference to review the progress of the implementation of the Helsinki Agreement, what organization has been established by the government to detail such progress in Canada?

The answer is:

For some years now there has been a small unit in the Eastern European Division of the Department of External Affairs devoted to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. It consists of a full time CSCE Coordinator and an Assistant. It draws on and is coordinated with the CSCE activities of other divisions of the department as well as other government departments and Canadian diplomatic missions abroad. Since the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, it has been following the progress in the implementation of the Final Act and preparing for Canadian participation in the Belgrade Review Conference.

Senator Thompson's second question was:

Specifically with reference to Basket III of the Agreement, what organization is to gather the required information?

The answer is:

The CSCE unit in the Department of External Affairs is the primary organization responsible for the assembling of information relating to Basket III. The gathering of basic information is done by the individual division in the Department of External Affairs dealing with the specific subject matter involved in Basket III (human contacts, information, culture, education), in cooperation with some other departments and Canadian diplomatic missions abroad, as required. For example, information relating to reunification of families and the other main aspects of the human contacts provisions of Basket III is collected by the Consular Operations Division in collaboration with the Department of Manpower and Immigration and our missions abroad and forwarded to the CSCE unit.

The third question was:

Is such operation, if established, requesting reports on progress from the various Canadian national ethnic organizations from all Communist countries in Europe?

The question is as follows:

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Don Jamieson, has invited Canadian ethnic organizations to provide the Department of External Affairs with all information relevant to the Helsinki Final Act and has undertaken to make officials of the department available to meet with these groups.

● (2020)

Representations, both oral and written, have already been received by the department and are continuing to be received from these ethnic organizations.

Question four:

Specifically, what are the numbers on both re-unification of families and individual emigration to Canada during the two years prior to the signing of the Helsinki Agreement and each year since, listed respectively from each Communist country in eastern Europe?

Honourable senators, the answer to this question is rather detailed and statistical, and I would ask the questioner and other honourable senators whether they would accept the printing of these statistics in the record of today's proceedings as an alternative to reading them at this time?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[The answer follows:]

Total emigration to Canada from each communist country in Eastern Europe on the basis of citizenship is as follows:

	1973	1974	1975	1976	1977	Jan-Mar.
Bulgaria	16	29	27	28	9
Czechoslovakia	163	148	161	145	62
German Democratic Rep.	—	—	31	31	8
Hungary	521	482	432	323	73
Poland	1361	1074	935	1087	217
Romania	124	142	255	213	76
USSR	306	260	233	324	85
Yugoslavia	3455	4061	3676	2138	419

[Later]

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, regarding the reply to Senator Thompson's last question with respect to the numbers of families that have been re-unified and the number of emigrants from the Soviet Union, and from the other satellite countries, to Canada, can the government leader give us any idea whether there has been any improvement at all since the Helsinki Agreement?

Senator Perrault: In the case of the Soviet Union, the figures are: 1973, 306; 1974, 260; 1975, 233; 1976, 324; and January to March, 1977, 85.

Senator Yuzyk: And emigrants out of the Soviet Union?

Senator Perrault: That is the total of emigration to Canada from the U.S.S.R. in those respective years.

Senator Yuzyk: Have you any figures with respect to the re-unification of families? It is just the general trend for which I am asking.

Senator Perrault: The general trend does not appear to indicate any significant increase. In the case of most of these countries if anything there would appear to be a downward trend.

TRANSPORTATION

ACCESS TO OTTAWA AIRPORT—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government whether or not it is a fact that for a considerable time last Thursday afternoon, June 16, a transport company obstructed access to that great airport through which all of us must have access or egress by air to and from the capital city; and, if so, whether it was a lawful obstruction? If it was not a lawful obstruction, what action is the government taking with respect thereto?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I regret that I have no information on that particular subject. If the honourable senator met with a personal inconvenience on his way to the airport last week, I would appreciate receiving any information, following which I would most certainly be willing to undertake an inquiry.

Senator Haig: You should have been at the airport that afternoon.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, while I was not involved personally, I was sufficiently close to the matter to believe that there was an obstruction. It is that knowledge which motivated me to ask the question, because it seems to me—I put this not quite in the form of a question—that any obstruction to an airport under the jurisdiction of the Government of Canada is a very serious matter indeed.

Senator Haig: Honourable senators, in connection with the question asked by Senator Smith, I happened to be at the airport last Thursday afternoon. Between 3.30 and 4.30 p.m. seven aircraft departed—four to Toronto and southward, two to the east, and one to the west. The four aircraft to Toronto left half empty—or half full, as you prefer. The one to the east left on time. However, when the aircraft to the west got to the end of the runway, it was found that one of the passengers had boarded the wrong plane. So Thursday was a very bad day. It was hot, everybody was mad, and there was an obstruction to the only entrance to the airport.

Senator Perrault: I appreciate the fact that the honourable senator has stated an approximate time of the alleged obstruction.

Senator Haig: It was an obstruction; not a delay.

Senator Perrault: It may well remain to be determined whether the Department of Transport had any responsibility for the situation. I think there is little point in speculating. Certainly an inquiry will be made of the Minister of Transport.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, may I make this observation by way of a question to the Leader of the Government. Is he aware that in spite of the equivalence of expression used by the last questioner, in some parts of this country there is quite a difference between being half full and half empty?

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MOTION TO SUPPORT PRINCIPLES OF HELSINKI DECLARATION

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I would ask unanimous consent to present a resolution with respect to the Helsinki Declaration, which is similar to one which has been adopted in the other place unanimously and without debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: Without debate.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk:

That the members of this House support the principles of the Helsinki Declaration, particularly noting those sections that deal with human rights and humanitarian issues and their implementation by all the signatory countries, and voice their deep concern with respect to the reported persecution in some of those countries of dissidents and religious believers, groups and others who uphold the observance of the Helsinki Declaration in their country.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, could I ask Senator Carter who in the House of Commons moved and seconded the declaration that he says unanimously carried there?

Senator Carter: It was moved by the Honourable Stanley Haidasz, and I believe it was seconded by Lloyd Francis, M.P.

● (2030)

Senator Flynn: Does that reassure you?

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I might suggest to the Honourable Senator Carter that the resolution would be stronger if it read, "the Senate of Canada," rather than, "this house". Secondly, I wonder if he would like to reconsider the last few words, read, "the rights guaranteed them by their respective constitutions." The reference is to "dissidents and religious believers, groups and others who uphold the observance of the Helsinki Declaration in their country and seek the rights guaranteed them by their respective constitutions."

That suggests to me that that is all that is being asked for, namely, the rights guaranteed them by their respective constitutions. Surely the intent is to go much beyond that, and to guarantee them the rights commonly accepted as human rights around the world. I just ask the honourable senator to consider whether this suggests that the Senate might be quite prepared to accept the rights guaranteed in the constitutions concerned, particularly those of the Iron Curtain countries, as being the measure of the rights to which they are entitled. It seems to me to be rather limiting, and might well, in the future, raise a question as to whether the Senate said, "Well, those are the rights we are talking about," namely, their rights under their respective constitutions. I just ask the honourable senator if he would care to reconsider the resolution in those terms.

Senator Carter: I thank Senator Grosart for his suggestions. I think "the Senate of Canada" is better wording, and if my seconder is in agreement I would substitute those words for "this house".

With respect to Senator Grosart's suggestion about the words, "the rights guaranteed them by their respective constitutions," those words were in the original draft, but on reflection we removed them because, while the constitutions of certain countries purport to guarantee the right to religious freedom, they also guarantee the right to anti-religious freedom, and we did not want to incorporate in the resolution anything that would reinforce anti-religious rights in those countries. That is why we did not include those words in the final draft.

Senator Grosart: So, the draft that was presented in advance was not the final draft.

Senator Carter: That is right.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Carter, seconded by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk:

That the Senate of Canada supports the principles of the Helsinki Declaration, particularly noting those sections that deal with human rights and humanitarian issues and their implementation by all the signatory countries, and voices its deep concern with respect to the persecution in some signatory countries of dissidents and religious believers, groups and others who uphold the observance of the Helsinki Declaration in their country.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand, for the second reading of the Bill C-34, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act respecting the establishment of marketing plans and to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act in consequence thereof".—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I yield the floor to Senator Argue.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Walker: Here comes the heavyweight.

Hon. Hazen Argue: I would like to be less of a heavyweight. I am sure that is the way the remark was meant.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to take part in this debate tonight, and I want to thank the whip for holding this position for me. When the bill was introduced I was in Calgary, having been invited to participate as a speaker in the North American Beef Congress. This is the first time it has been held in Canada. That congress was attended by representatives of beef producers and the whole industry on the North American continent. I was honoured by an invitation to be the first speaker at the congress, and I am sure that that invitation was extended to me because of my being Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Following my speech, there were speeches by Senator John Melcher of Montana, President Boyd Anderson of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, Miss Ruth Lodzkar, President of the Consumers' Association of Canada, and Mr. Wayne Finney, President of the American National Cattlemen's Association. It is my view that I was invited to that congress because of the outstanding work which has been done by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on its inquiry into the whole question of beef stabilization. The reason our committee has such a good standing with the beef industry in Canada is due entirely to the hard work done by the members—and both sides of this house are represented on the committee. The invitation came to me because of the work of all the members of the committee.

The Senate does not get the press coverage it deserves. We are very bashful, on occasion, about the work of the Senate. We feel we are subject to criticism. I can say that in all of the committee's meetings, which were held across this country in some five provinces, plus my appearance at this congress of the industry for all of North America, not one single criticism was made of the Senate or of the work of the Senate. I sometimes think that we are our own worst enemies. The Senate is criticized mainly by the press gallery in Ottawa, and by senators themselves. In that respect, I am as guilty as any others. I am not trying to chastise anyone. I feel we have a very good standing in most parts of the country, and that is something which each one of us should try to take advantage of in pursuing our work here.

Senator Olson, in introducing this bill, provided the Senate with a full explanation of its contents. It provides for a voluntary pooling system for rapeseed and any other grains outside of the Canadian Wheat Board. Some years ago a vote was taken as to whether or not rapeseed should be included in the Canadian Wheat Board system, with the result that 46 per cent were in favour and 53 per cent against. For a number of generations many farmers—and I think it is a growing percentage as the years go by—felt that the commodity market, the grains exchange system, was not operating in the best interests of producers. As a result of that general feeling, producers asked for, and got, the Canadian Wheat Board.

The Canadian Wheat Board at one time had exclusive jurisdiction over wheat and, in effect, exclusive jurisdiction over oats and barley. It had little or no jurisdiction, except perhaps by way of quotas, over flaxseed and rye.

Given the closeness of the vote, and the strong support on the part of producers for having rapeseed included in the Canadian Wheat Board system—and producers of rapeseed are producers of wheat—it was my view that consideration should have been given to holding another vote on the question. Had that been done, this bill, in my view, would not have been necessary. In my very brief research of the question, I have found that there is little or no demand—certainly no widespread demand—on the part of producers for this bill. There is certainly no demand among producers generally, and I am informed there is no demand by the wheat pools or the private grain companies for the selting up of such an operation as is provided for in this bill. If it becomes law perhaps it will be used very little, but there may be campaigns to make use of it.

● (2040)

However, I, for one, feel that this bill is not necessary. If it is passed it will provide, as Senator Olson has said, for two kinds of pool—one which would provide at the end of the pool for a payout on the basis of an average street price; the other, which would be a fully pooling arrangement, would provide for a payout based on the actual selling price and the sales achieved for the rapeseed in the pool period. The Treasury will make a guarantee of 90 per cent of the initial payout in the pooling system.

Many people criticize governments for spending excessive amounts of money—

An Hon. Senator: But not all.

Senator Argue:—but I think that usually most expenditures are made after widespread requests that they be made. Here is an offer to spend money, without any great number of requests. It would seem to me that this is the kind of thing that is not necessary for governments to do. I am one who believes the Canadian Wheat Board system to be a good one. It has proven to be of great value to Canada. It has the general support of producers in western Canada. As a matter of fact, many producers in the United States who live close to the Canadian border are conducting a campaign for a wheat pooling system based on the Canadian Wheat Board.

If it is passed and becomes law, this bill will provide an opportunity for producers to have a pooling system outside of the Canadian Wheat Board. Well, 46 per cent of the producers in that referendum voted in favour of the Canadian Wheat Board system, so I do not think the people wanting the pooling system will be in the 46 per cent—at least, very few, because they do not believe in this kind of a system. Of the 53 per cent who voted against a Canadian Wheat Board pooling system, I would doubt that very many of them voted against the Canadian Wheat Board pooling system only to establish some other kind of a pooling system.

It would seem to me, if this law results in pools in fact being established, that it will be more difficult to get a clear-cut vote in the future on the principle of marketing grain through the Canadian Wheat Board and, of course, this bill, as it is drafted and if it becomes law, can include grains other than rapeseed. I quote from the top of page 2:

(a) rapeseed, and

(b) such other grain or variety, grade or class thereof, not required to be marketed through the Board, as is designated by the Governor in Council as a grain for the purposes of this Part.

Today, barley, oats, feed wheat, flax, rye and rapeseed are marketed outside of the Wheat Board system, so it will be possible to set up a proliferation of little pools under this bill for every single grain, including wheat that is outside of export wheat, and wheat going to mills. As Senator Olson suggested, our committee should hear from people in the Canadian Wheat Board. I would hope that farm leaders in this country would think the principle of the bill sufficiently important to express their opinions about it. The Senate should deal with the bill on the basis of its merits, or lack of merits, and we should, in a substantial measure, be governed by the producers to whom it might apply.

The Canadian Wheat Board system, I suggest, is a good one. I would like to see it supported in every possible way, and I cannot help but feel concerned when I read a measure like this. It suggests to me that it may result in difficulties for the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian Wheat Board system.

Honourable senators, I suppose it is pretty obvious from the rambling way that I have made my remarks that I have not been coached by any organization, and am not speaking for any organization. As a matter of fact, I really do not know how those organizations stand on this question. On the basis of my experience as a grain producer over the years, and my reading of the history of the marketing system in Canada, I have very grave doubts about the merits of this measure. At any rate, I think, with Senator Olson, that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture should become well informed about the principles and the application of this measure if it becomes law.

Senator Flynn: You can kill the bill in committee, if you wish.

Hon. Horace A. Olson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Olson speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to spend only a very few minutes in closing the debate on second reading, and endeavouring to answer some of the questions that have been raised by Senator Yuzyk and Senator Argue.

Senator Yuzyk asserted that the government intended to assume 90 per cent of the losses for these pooling arrangements that may be set up under the authority of this bill. That is probably not too far from the fact, although that is not what the bill says. The bill says that an arrangement may be entered into between one of the grain companies, or one of the grain pools, for a guarantee of 90 per cent of the initial price. That may not be very different from losses but, for the sake of accuracy, I have to say that it may not be the same thing.

The honourable senator also asked what is meant by "significant number" because the bill does provide that a significant number of producers would have to be in a position of requesting that a pool be set up with one or more of the companies involved in the grain trade. I cannot answer specifically whether it is 2 per cent, 20 per cent or any other percentage. I suppose, in strictly pragmatic terms, the government would have to look at the numbers, and in some way ascertain that there is a sufficient number of producers so that the pool could, in fact, be viable.

In reply to the question about what happens if a farmer elects to go into a pooling agreement and then the market goes up some time during the year, I would point out that the bill categorically provides that once a farmer chooses to enter a pooling arrangement, he will have his permit book endorsed and will be obliged to stay with the pool for the balance of that crop year. I certainly would not want any producer to be under any misapprehension in that regard, and that will be made very clear to them. But it also has to be pointed out that if the market goes up during a year, then, of course, these pooling arrangements would also have higher receipts during that year. On the average, they may not be as high as the very highest peak in the year, and I think producers who go into these pooling arrangements have to understand that the main purpose is to average the price, and their returns from the sale of rapeseed and these other grains would be the average over the whole year. They cannot expect to receive the price for rapeseed or any other grain at the highest point in the entire marketing year, or the highest market price for any particular day.

Senator Yuzyk asked what we were going to do about people who go outside of the pool and become bootleggers—that is to say, after they have made an agreement to sell to the pool they find ways and means through or with their neighbours to sell outside. Well, of course, that is already part of the law with respect to quotas and administration by the Canadian Wheat Board, and all I can say is that the same law will apply to them as is now applied by the Canadian Wheat Board, except that they may be required to declare that they are going to sell all of their rapeseed. It is not necessary now that a farmer declares that he is going to sell all his wheat. For example, he can sell some feed wheat other than to the Canadian Wheat Board, so I expect the law would have to be applied in essentially the same way.

Finally, with respect to Senator Argue's argument that there ought to be another vote, because he did not detect any demand amongst producers that this kind of legislation be brought in at this time, I have to say that this is enabling legislation; it provides, first of all, an opportunity, and an opportunity only, for the grain companies and the grain pools to set up a pooling arrangement for a marketing year. But even after that is done, every producer will have to join voluntarily, and I would draw Senator Argue's attention to the fact that 46 per cent of the producers who voted in the plebiscite in 1974 indicated that they were prepared to have full pooling arrangements for the sale of their rapeseed, which is essentially the same as what the Canadian Wheat Board does now for all the grain that goes into their market. Therefore, I think there are significant numbers of people who want it.

It seems to me that this bill does in fact give us, if it is possible, the best of both worlds. Those who want to get into a pool may do so, and those who prefer to take their chances on the daily market fluctuations will have that opportunity. I do not believe it is in any way going to cause the Canadian Wheat Board system to deteriorate. I do not see the possibility of a great proliferation of pools. I think there will have to be some experimentation in the initial stages—perhaps for a year or two—to find out which of the pools functions best in the interests of the producers, and probably before long the producers themselves will decide that one or two pools—in any event, a very limited number—are the best for their purpose. So, I do not really see the damage to the Wheat Board system—which so many producers in western Canada support—that Senator Argue referred to.

I thank all honourable senators for listening to the debate with such attention, and hope that the bill will have reasonably expeditious passage through the committee, and be reported back to the house so that it becomes law this session.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Olson moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA LANDS SURVEYS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Riley for the second reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Act.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: The conversation that has been going on to my right will now cease. Thank you.

Honourable senators, I have great pleasure in speaking to this bill to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Act, formerly called the Dominion Survey Act. The bill provides for a new designation in English for surveyors, namely, "Canada Lands Surveyor." The bill also indicates that such a person requires a wider range of educational qualifications. Whatever name is used, you can rest assured that when this surveyor signs a report, it will be certified in every respect and the person having a title certified will find it to be true and correct.

Speaking of land surveying in the west, which I know something about, they had lots which went along the river, so many feet wide and two miles deep, called river lots. In the opening of the west they decided to have the land surveyed under the Torrens system, which is by section, township, and range. They established a principal meridian from which all meridians, east and west, are counted. This principal meridian, which is marked by a cairn, is located about 10 miles from Winnipeg, and you can see the cairn as you travel west on the trans-Canada highway. It is to the north of the highway. The cairn is enclosed by a steel fence, and it states that this meridian is the principal meridian for all western Canada surveys. I happen to know something about this because the land on which the cairn stands was given by the late Senator Benard to my father.

Now this principal meridian starts there with section, township and range and it makes a section of one mile square. As you go north or south on the principal meridian you get to what is called a correction line. If you go northward you find that the road takes a jog to compensate for the convergence of the meridians.

The bill, in addition to establishing the educational qualifications of the surveyor, tends to replace the southern system of surveying to the north. You can understand that if you look at a map of the north.

Now the private conversation has moved across to the opposite side of the house. Perhaps we could have a division somewhere along the line so that if we have conversations at least I might understand them.

• (2100)

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Senator Smith (Colchester): What they say is not worth listening to anyway.

Senator Haig: I don't know. I am getting a little worried by the conversations going on to my right and in front of me. I will try to make my remarks brief so that we can all carry on our different conversations.

In the north, especially in the tundra, including the rivers and lakes up there, along with the offshore measurements they intend to establish cairns on land so that a ship can go out to sea and with an electronic device zone in on these cairns. By zeroing in on two different cairns they will be able to tell, from where the two lines meet, that they are so many miles from land. In that way they will be able to obtain a position on the sea bed which they can determine in miles. Obviously, the determination will be metric later on, but they have not reached that stage yet.

Another aspect to it is that where you find a township, town or village in a quadrant you take that out of the quadrant and you make a townsite and you have lots, and so on. But in that part of the country settlements change owing to the nomadic character of the people there. To offset that the company will be able to obtain a certificate or some kind of paper indicating that at a certain time it owned or leased the particular piece of land. That ownership or lease may last for 10 to 15 years, but at least the company will have something there which is certified by a land surveyor.

That is asked for and determined for mining and oil exploration in the north on land, and also in respect of the sea bed. There has to be some method of determining at which precise point the company owns land and that is where it can drill.

Honourable senators, because of the full explanation given by Senator Riley when he introduced this bill, I hardly think it needs to go to committee. In fact, when he closes the debate on second reading I would ask him to move that the bill be given third reading at the next sitting.

Senator Cameron: I wonder if Senator Haig could define the extent of the high water mark. How far does the river lot extend from the high water mark or water line back from the river or stream?

Senator Haig: The river lot was so many feet wide at the river level, at the high point of the river, and it went back two miles. It was parallel for 100 feet or 200 feet, I forget which, and went back two miles. The system was then completely changed so that there were sections one mile square north to about the 60th parallel. That was because the land was mainly flat or high rolling land. But you cannot do that up north. So the reason is that instead of having this flat system you have to take it in quadrants. That may be so many miles wide and so many miles deep or high, and certain sections or certain parts of the land may be different. But at least they will be placed on the maps, and if you want to go quadrant eight, for instance, you will find that on the map. Then they will determine by survey where your mining or oil exploration will be. At least you will have some determination of what you own or lease. That is the reason for it. It is because of the type of land up there.

On the other hand, if you used the southern system you might find the end of one section in the middle of a lake, which for all practical purposes would not be particularly useful. At any rate, that is the reason for it.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Riley speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Haig for his kind words. I only wish I had lived up to the praise he has given me this evening.

As he and other senators well know, I am no expert in survey matters, but I was pleased to hear Senator Haig refer to the Torrens system of land registration. We only wish we had that system in the east so that land surveyors could plot out our farmlands properly. They may come to that eventually, but I know from searching titles myself that all you have to do in the west is go into the registrar's office and you will find everything laid out in sections for which you can obtain certificates; but in the east we often have to search the titles ourselves right back to the time of the crown grants, and you will find farm descriptions reading something like: "All that lot, parcel or piece of land bounded on the north by John Smith," who died 100 years ago; "bounded on the west by a rail fence," which has disappeared; "bounded on the east by a lane," which has probably been replaced by a highway two miles away, "and on the south by . . ." whatever else you might think of. That is what we have to cope with. That is why we envy you your Torrens system.

If I might say a word about the system of offshore surveying, they are now using drill rigs offshore on which they put monuments and then by radar, vision, the quadrant, or whatever, they can make a fix on that to establish their positions. In this manner they go right along the inner part of the continental shelf. They are also using ships, the U.S. satellites, the polar satellites, the globe circulating satellites. So you can see how far they have come in their methods.

Honourable senators, bearing in mind Senator Haig's suggestion to omit the committee stage, I would simply move that the bill be given second reading now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Riley moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 16, the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, which was presented Wednesday, June 15.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, this debate was adjourned in my name because I was unable to be present to hear Senator Everett's speech when he presented the report of the National Finance Committee. After reading his remarks I realized he had said everything I would have said myself, so there is no point in my detaining you for more than a minute or two.

• (2110)

I agree that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is able to do effective work when it deals with specific problems of a specific department, but it is quite impossible for the committee to study the main estimates and make a report that contains anything more than generalities. I suggest, therefore, that the committee should continue its search for better methods of examining the main estimates. I know it will not be easy, but I feel that both here and in the other place we are losing control of the expenditures of government.

We should always be on the alert, and with some of the suggestions that have been made from time to time by the Auditor General, and the creation of the new post of Controller General—the Controller General is only for the benefit of the government, but the government needs to have more tools for controlling its expenditures—Parliament can search for other ways and means to enable it to do a better job. If I spoke for an hour, I certainly would not be able to offer a solution tonight.

Motion agreed to, and report adopted.

THE SENATE CHAMBER

TAKING OF PHOTOGRAPHS BY THE PUBLIC—MOTION WITHDRAWN

Hon. Daniel Riley, pursuant to notice of motion of June 15, moved:

That visitors to Parliament be permitted to take photographs of the interior of the Senate chamber, the Senate antechamber and the foyer of the Senate at all times during visiting hours, except during:

- (a) a sitting of the Senate;
- (b) the period of one hour immediately prior to a sitting of the Senate;
- (c) the period of 15 minutes immediately following the adjournment of a sitting of the Senate; or
- (d) any period when the Senate chamber is closed for maintenance purposes or is being used for such special meetings as may be authorized by the Senate, and only in those areas where visitors are permitted to circulate under the supervision of an official tour guide.

He said: Honourable senators, I ask permission to make a couple of slight amendments to the motion standing in my name.

The last paragraph of my earlier motion has been incorporated in the first paragraph without any great change. In subparagraph (c) I ask to have the words "15 minutes" deleted, and replaced by "one hour." This means that I have to ask that the first paragraph and the last paragraph be deleted and replaced by another first paragraph, so that the motion reads as follows:

That visitors to Parliament in those areas where they are permitted to circulate under the supervision of an official tour guide be permitted to take photographs of the interior of the Senate chamber, the antechamber and the foyer and hallways within the Senate precincts at all times during the visiting hours except during;

- (a) a sitting of the Senate;
- (b) the period of one hour immediately prior to a sitting of the Senate;
- (c) the period of one hour immediately following a sitting of the Senate; or

(d) any period when the Senate chamber is closed for maintenance purposes or is being used for such special meetings as may be authorized by the Senate.

This is exactly the same as the privilege that is given to visitors to the other place.

Senator Flynn: Is it embodied in the rules of the other place?

Senator Riley: No.

Senator Flynn: Is it a practice there?

Senator Riley: I think it has become the practice. As far as I know, it is a directive issued to the tour guides by the Chief of the Protective Staff.

Senator Flynn: Would you be satisfied if the Senate agrees, and Madam Speaker gives that directive.

Senator Riley: By all means.

Senator Flynn: I think that is all right. That is the way it should be done.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Has Senator Riley looked into the question of whether senators may take pictures of the chamber, and, if so, when? I ask this very seriously, because I am interested in photography, but have refrained from bringing my camera inside the door.

Senator Riley: I appreciate that question, because one of the senators to whom I have spoken told me it had been indicated to him by a member of the Protective Staff, when he had some relatives here, that neither he nor any of his party could take pictures of the Senate chamber.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That is what I was told.

Senator Riley: I should like to see anybody stop me from taking a picture of the chamber when it is unoccupied, or of any of the Speakers' portraits in the hall.

Senator Flynn: I would not dare.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I would remind Senator Riley that I am only three-quarters Irish.

Senator Riley: But you are a rugged fighter, senator. I know how strongly you fought for your party in Nova Scotia, and how well you guided the toddling footsteps of those who followed behind you, and with what a strong hand you held the tiller when you were the Premier of your province.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, perhaps I might make a brief observation. I am informed that the practice that has existed to this time was to restrict photography within the chamber because, at one time, flash bulbs were not of the safe variety that exist today. Some time ago there was great concern about the possibility of setting the building on fire again.

Senator Flynn: You mean setting the Senate on fire?

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition attempts to do this every afternoon in a rhetorical way. There was concern that certain types of flash powders, and later flash bulbs, might explode and incinerate the chamber. However, technological advances in photographic equipment, including fast film and safety bulbs, make a relaxation of this rule possible. I certainly see no objection to having the one-hour rule apply, although some senators have expressed the view that on sitting days photography should not be permitted after twelve noon, and not after six o'clock, when there are evening sittings. However, it is a matter of choice.

Senator Flynn: What about referring this matter to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration? I do not like the idea of a formal motion for this.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would not resist the procedure suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. This matter relates to the chamber, and I think Madam Speaker should have a voice in it. I understand that for special visitors and special occasions the practice is to obtain permission from Her Honour. There seems to be general agreement that this one-hour rule be brought into effect.

Senator Macdonald: I would suggest that Senator Riley withdraw his motion, and leave the matter to Madam Speaker, who can establish some guidelines.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I certainly do not rise to disagree with my distinguished colleague from Cape Breton. That would never be safe. However, I do rise to say, in all seriousness, that, delightful and artistic though the chamber itself may be, I think it is made more vivid and alive by the presence of the persons who are entitled to sit here. Consequently, a picture which included them might very well convey more of interest than the bare walls themselves.

● (2120)

For instance, I should like to be able to enliven the accounts of my adventures in this chamber to my friends by showing a picture of the Leader of the Government in full flight of oratory. I do not really understand why we are so shy about having our pictures taken. I find that to be an archaic sort of thing, which we ought not to insist upon in the way we seem to do.

So, far from agreeing that there should be one hour's interval between the sitting of the Senate and the last picture-taking, I would be inclined to argue that there be no restrictions at all within the limits of ordinary common sense and lack of disturbance of the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the suggestion that there should be unrestricted use of photography is an idea that I would resist. It seems to me that in circumstances in which the honourable senator may wish, for example, a photograph of himself in his seat, special permission could be obtained through Madam Speaker to have that done, and the photograph should be taken when there is no sitting of the Senate. I would certainly resist the general idea of having photographs taken in this chamber during sittings of the Senate.

In view of the fact that Madam Speaker is a member of the Internal Economy Committee, perhaps the idea advanced by the Leader of the Opposition has a good deal of merit. Under those circumstances, if the honourable senator would care to withdraw his motion and have the matter referred to that committee, with a recommendation that a one-hour rule be introduced, I would have no objection.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would ask Senator Riley to withdraw his motion, and I will issue instructions along the lines suggested.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I suppose it is probably out of order for me to ask a question now of the Leader of the Government, but if I might be permitted to be out of order, I would ask him, does he think that taking pictures in the Senate would be any more disturbing than television in the Senate—aside from the fact that it might tend to keep senators awake?

I am serious about this. I am not fooling about this. After all, what is there about the Senate that is so sacrosanct that pictures should not be taken of senators in action, when in the other house the adjournment is being arranged so that time may be given to allow the necessary preparations to be made for televising the proceedings thereof?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is certainly nothing to prevent the Internal Economy Committee from looking at the proposal made by the honourable senator. I simply rose on my own behalf to suggest that unlimited use of flash guns and photography in this chamber may not be appropriate at this time. I would be interested in the views of the Leader of the loyal Opposition.

Senator Langlois: Leave it to the Internal Economy Committee.

Senator Flynn: The Internal Economy Committee can deal with it.

Senator Grosart: It is the nation's business that we are dealing with.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I quite appreciate the suggestion of Senator Flynn, supported by the Leader of the Government, that I withdraw this motion; and I would be very glad to withdraw it.

I wanted to withdraw the motion. I asked a question about this, but received no answer. It is a very simple matter, easy to adjust. It is easy to rearrange the directive that was sent to the Chief of the Protective Service of the Commons on May 18 last, saying that they could take pictures only on Fridays, Saturdays, Sundays and holidays.

I wanted to withdraw my motion, and I discussed the withdrawal with officials. But it was suggested to me that perhaps I should move the motion because some honourable senators might want to vote against it. But I now see that there are no honourable senators who want to oppose this motion—

Senator Flynn: We do not support the idea of a formal motion.

Senator Riley: I am in full accord provided that the Speaker, as she has undertaken so to do, will issue a new directive to the Chief of the Protective Service of the Commons. I know that I have the permission of the seconder, and I therefore request that the motion be withdrawn. I thank all honourable senators for their support.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I know that I am not meeting with much favour, but I should like to ask another question of the Leader of the Government. Is he aware that in the light which exists here now, and with the cameras and films which are now available, it is perfectly possible to take good and satisfactory pictures without using flash bulbs?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am aware of the new 500 ASA high speed colour films which permit photography "in dark closets at midnight," but I think one of the decisions to be made by the Senate is whether it is appropriate to allow photography in the chamber on an unlimited basis. That is a decision which the committee may wish to consider.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Riley withdraw his motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS MONITORING BILL REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred Bill S-4, to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 21, 1977.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill S-4, intituled: "An Act to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada" has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, May 26, 1977, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 4: Insert immediately after line 35 the following subclause:

"(5) Where the Minister proposes to disclose information pursuant to subsection (4) in a form that identifies or permits the identification of the corporation to which the information relates, he shall so notify the corporation and afford it a reasonable opportunity to make representations as to the effect the disclosure of the information might have on the corporation's competitive position."

2. Page 6: Strike out lines 23 to 39 in clause 9 and substitute therefor the following:

"(2) The Minister shall,

(a) Within 120 days from the date of seizure of any documents, books, records, papers or things pursuant to paragraph (1)(d), or

(b) if within that time an application is made under this subsection that is, after the expiration of that time, rejected, then forthwith upon the disposition of the application, return the documents, books, records, papers or things to the person from whom they were seized unless a judge of a superior court or county court, on application made by or on behalf of the Minister, supported by evidence on oath establishing that the Minister has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that there has been a violation of this Act and that the seized documents, books, records, papers or things are or may be required as evidence in relation thereto, orders that they be retained by the Minister until they are produced in any court proceedings, which order the judge is hereby empowered to give on ex parte application.

(3) The person from whom any documents, books, records, papers or things are seized pursuant to paragraph (1)(d) is, at all reasonable times and subject to such reasonable conditions as may be determined by the Minister, entitled to inspect the seized documents, books, records, papers or things and to obtain copies thereof at his own expense.

(4) Where any book, record or other document has been seized, examined or produced under this section, the person by whom it is seized or examined or to whom it is produced or any officer engaged in the administration or enforcement of this Act may make, or cause to be made, one or more copies thereof and a document purporting to be certified by the Minister or a person thereunto authorized by the Minister to be a copy made pursuant to this section is admissible in evidence and has the same probative force as the original document would have if it had been proven in the ordinary way.

(5) No person shall hinder or molest or interfere with any person doing anything that he is authorized by or pursuant to this section to do or prevent or attempt to prevent any person doing any such thing and, notwithstanding any other law to the contrary, every person shall, unless he is unable to do so, do everything he is required by or pursuant to this section to do."

3. Page 7: Strike out line 22 in clause 11 and substitute therefor the following:

"(i) it knows contains an untrue statement of a"

4. Page 7: Strike out line 24 in clause 11 and substitute therefor the following:

"(ii) it knows omits to state a material fact"

5. Pages 7 and 8: Strike out in clause 12 lines 40 to 43 on page 7 and lines 1 to 4 on page 8 and substitute therefor the following:

"(a) violates section 6 or subsection 9(5), or

(b) fails to comply with a requirement lawfully made pursuant to paragraph 9(1)(c)"

6. Page 9: Strike out Item 15 in Schedule 1 and substitute therefor the following:

"15. Husky Oil Operations Ltd."

Respectfully submitted,

Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hayden moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

RETIREMENT OF PERSONNEL—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government whether the government has currently under consideration measures designed to alleviate the hardships suffered by members of the armed forces, especially other ranks, required to retire from the forces because of age?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall undertake an inquiry on that matter.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION (SCIENTIFIC ACTIVITIES) BILL, 1976

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on Bill C-26, respecting the organization of certain scientific activities of the Government of Canada, which was presented yesterday.

Senator Carter moved that the report be adopted.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I could ask Senator Carter a question. He will recall that in the committee meeting we were unable to obtain a breakdown of the $170 million, of $180 million of government funding of these councils, as between the different councils. Is it the intention to follow up that request and, when the information is received, to make it available to the Senate?

Senator Carter: I should like to inform the Senate that that information is being compiled, and as soon as it is received it will be circulated.

Honourable senators, before the report is adopted I should like to say a word or two in explanation of the amendment, which is a technical one. To explain it I have to refer back to Bill C-53, which was passed earlier this week by this chamber. Its title is: "An Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970 and other Acts subsequent to 1970." This seems to have created an anomaly of its own. Clause 30 of Bill C-53 amended the National Library Act with respect to membership on the National Library Advisory Board. Clause 74 of Bill C-26 also amended the National Library Act with respect to membership on the National Library Advisory Board. The anomaly came about because through an accident of timing Bill C-26 was introduced much earlier than was Bill C-53 and, because of that, it was expected that Bill C-26 would be through the parliamentary process before Bill C-53, rather than after.

Bill C-53 provided representation for three bodies, as does Bill C-26, but not the same three. Bill C-53 provided representation on the boards for the Canada Council, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the National Research Council. It could not make provision for representation for the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, because that body will not come into existence until Bill C-26 has been passed and proclaimed. Bill C-26, on the other hand, provides for representation for the Canada Council, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, but does not provide for representation for the National Research Council. The amendment provides for representation of all four bodies on the National Library Advisory Board.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I shall comment on a point which was raised in committee and in connection with which I am still not satisfied. That is that while provision is made in this amendment, and in the former bill, for representation by some of the councils on the National Library Advisory Board, no provision has been made for representation of one of the two new councils and of the Medical Research Council. It still seems to me that this is a serious omission, although the explanation was given that the interests of these councils might be represented on the National Library Advisory Board by others. I would still suggest that this is far from satisfactory. It simply seems to me to make no sense whatsoever that in establishing two new councils one should be given representation and the other not, and that the Medical Research Council should be excluded.

I make that comment at this stage in the hope that in due course a change will be made to correct what seems to me to be not the proper way to proceed in setting up the type of scientific representation on the National Library Advisory Board that would seem to be appropriate, when we have at least five councils in this field and only three of them are represented.

Senator Carter: Senator Grosart has made a valid point. However, I am unable to provide any further explanation to what was given with respect to the same point when it was raised in committee. You may rest assured, though, that it will be brought to the attention of the minister.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, although Senator Carter stated that the amendments proposed by the committee are considered to be of only a technical nature, I am quite sure that nevertheless the committee members were assured that the amendments will be welcomed by the government and in the other place, and will not delay the passage of the bill or create any problem. I say this because I understand that this is always the worry of any committee of the Senate.

Motion agreed to, and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Carter moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

AERONAUTICS ACT AND NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 16, the debate on the motion of Senator Lang for the second reading of Bill C-46, to amend the Aeronautics Act and the National Transportation Act.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, I do not know why, but whenever I rise to speak conversations commence to the right, left and centre. I ask that all conversations be postponed for three or four minutes while I make a short speech on this bill.

Senator Grosart: You will have our undivided attention.

Senator Haig: I hope that statement is true of all members of this house.

Bill C-46, if passed, will amend the Aeronautics Act and the National Transportation Act. To provide honourable senators with some background I will mention that the bill was considered by the Transport and Communications Committee of the House of Commons on June 9, and was given third reading by that house on June 10. It was introduced in the Senate on June 16 by Senator Lang. The purpose of the bill is expressed in the proposed new sections 1.1 and 2.1 of the Aeronautics Act and the National Transportation Act respectively, which read as follows:

This Act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province and any agent thereof.

That purpose is to make binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or any of the provinces of Canada the regulations of the Canadian Transport Commission.

The need for this amendment arose out of a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of the Province of Alberta and Pacific Western Airlines which stated that the Aeronautics Act did not apply to the provinces. As a result of that decision, the government introduced this bill which, if passed, will make binding on both provincial and federal airlines the provisions of the Aeronautics Act and the National Transportation Act. The CTC will have the power to suspend the licence of any airline which does not comply with the new provisions.

A provincially-owned airline could conceivably operate on international routes, the control and establishment of which rests with the federal government. For that reason, the federal government, through the CTC, wishes to have control over the ownership of all airlines, whether federally or provincially incorporated.

This is the third bill on which I have had the honour to speak. It was not deemed necessary that the other two bills be referred to committee. I hope my track record in that respect is not broken.

Senator Flynn: I do not know whether I can keep your track record intact. I understand the purpose of the bill. I am interested, however, in the rationale behind its introduction. I understand that the federal government wants any province which acquires shares in an airline to become subject to the regulations of the Canadian Transport Commission. That is all well and good, but I should like to know what guidelines the commission plans to set down with respect to such acquisitions by a province or an agent thereof. In introducing this legislation, the government, it seems to me, is admitting it has some doubts about the propriety of a province's acquiring control of an airline.

This was a problem raised by Senator Austin some time ago when he expressed concern about the fact that the head office of Pacific Western Airlines had been moved from Vancouver to Calgary. Do I understand that such a move, now that this company is under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Transport Commission, would have to be approved by the commission? That is one matter I am not too sure about. But the government must have some rule or guideline in mind. It is all very well to resolve a legal problem by saying that the province comes under the authority of the Canadian Transport Commission when it acquires shares in an airline or any other transportation company, but I would like to know from the sponsor of the bill whether this is in fact the case. If he cannot give a proper answer at this time, then I hope my honourable friend will not mind moving that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications so that the matter may be clarified there. This is of the essence.

If there is nothing more to this than meets the eye, then I am quite sure Senator Lang will be able to provide the answer. But, if he cannot do so, then I would suggest, as I have said, that he move that the bill be referred to committee for further study.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I am not at all sure that I quite understand my honourable friend when he asks me to explain "if this is the case." I did not understand what case he was referring to but, specifically, this bill is not retroactive and it does not apply to the Pacific Western Airline situation.

Senator Flynn: But in the future?

Senator Lang: In the future, of course, the provinces, if this legislation is passed, will be subject to the same regulatory authority as any private carrier. I think my honourable friend is in error when he uses the phrase "propriety of a provincial government's owning an airline." I think he is using the wrong word. The problem is whether a province which owns an airline would, in fact, under the legislation as it now stands, be subject to the jurisdiction of the Canadian Transport Commission. It is my understanding that if, in fact, federal legislation does not specifically bind the crown in right of a province then, the crown in right of the province is not so bound. This bill specifically binds the crown in right of a province, and consequently brings airlines that might be owned by a province within the jurisdiction of the Canadian Transport Commission.

From the constitutional background—

Senator Flynn: I know all about that.

Senator Lang: It is fairly evident that—

Senator Flynn: —that you do not want to reply to my question.

Senator Lang: As I said, honourable senators, I am not quite sure what the question is. But the jurisdiction of the federal government is clear in the case of airlines flying interprovincial and international routes. It has been made clear by a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Flynn: Don't try to sidetrack me on to a route other than the one I suggested I wanted to follow.

Senator Lang: I think it is almost self-evident that the purpose of this bill is to bind a province which owns an airline to the same regulations that any private carrier would have to observe in carrying out a similar operation. I find it hard to believe that the importance of that, beyond the regulatory powers of the Canadian Transport Commission, needs enumerating. If any province could own and operate an airline without regard to federal regulatory authority, there would be nothing but chaos in Canadian air transportation, and chaos in international air transportation with respect to agreements between Canadian-operated airlines and airlines of other countries.

● (1430)

Senator Flynn: Oh, no.

Senator Lang: If my honourable friend fails to comprehend the problem and the extrapolations of jurisdictions here, I am afraid I cannot do much more than what I have already done to rectify his lack of comprehension.

Senator Flynn: I am afraid Senator Lang's reply is entirely unsatisfactory. Indeed, he has not replied to my question. To suggest that the mere ownership of an airline by a province would bring chaos to international routes is simply unrealistic. Whether a province has the right to deal with a foreign country is beside the point. The question I was asking was whether the government, with this policy, was intending to prevent provinces from acquiring airlines or was attempting to prevent provinces controlling airlines from moving the head offices of those airlines from one province to another, or things like that. As far as international routes are concerned, I can understand the problem, but it has never existed.

If Senator Lang cannot reply to my question, then I am sure he will wish to have the bill referred to committee, because I know I will certainly receive a better answer there than the one he has attempted to give me.

Senator Lang: I will not try to answer my honourable friend's question on "or things like that," but I will say that, no, it is not the intention of the federal government to preclude the ownership of airlines by provincial governments. However, if they are to own such airlines, they must have the consent of the Governor in Council.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Lang: So that each case will be determined upon its merits.

I can easily conceive of a province operating an airline within its jurisdictional boundaries and, in doing so, disrupting the whole fare system on trans-provincial routings. I did not think I was dealing with an obscure kind of problem, but it may be that a certain obtusity is being reflected from the opposite side of this chamber.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Could the sponsor of the bill tell me if there was any consultation, or any need for consultation, between the federal government and the provincial governments in respect of this legislation?

Senator Lang: To have the answer to that question, senator, it will be necessary to send the bill to committee.

Senator Flynn: Hah!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Lang moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

NOTICE OF MEETINGS

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment of the house I would draw your attention to the continuing heavy schedule of meetings of Senate standing committees. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is at present meeting in room 256-S, and when the Senate rises the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet in room 356-S to consider Bill C-34.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 23, 1977

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1977

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-58, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1978.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Orders of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, respecting certain compensation plans, as follows:

1. The Board of Commissioners of Police for the Town of Kenora, Ontario and the group of its Police and Clerical employees, represented by the Kenora Police Association. Order dated June 17, 1977.

2. Lawson Business Forms (Manitoba) Limited and the group of its plant supervisory personnel at Winnipeg, Manitoba. Order dated June 17, 1977.

3. The Otis Elevator Company Ltd. and the group of its plant hourly employees, represented by the United Steelworkers of America, Local 7062. Order dated June 17, 1977.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-48, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

AERONAUTICS ACT AND NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Haig, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-46, to amend the Aeronautics Act and the National Transportation Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Flynn: Next sitting.

Senator Lang moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, June 27, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put I should like to outline briefly, as well as I can at this time, the business of the Senate for next week. As we have done for the past few weeks, we are planning to have the Senate sit on both Monday and Tuesday evenings, leaving more time for committee meetings on Tuesday.

On Monday we will continue with the supply bill and other items already on the order paper. The bills that should come to us from the House of Commons next week are: Bill C-5, The Currency and Exchange Act; Bill C-18, The Bretton Woods Agreements Act; Bill C-20, The Auditor General Act; Bill C-49, The Canada Pension Plan, and perhaps Bill C-51, The Criminal Law Amendment Act. In addition, it appears that on Tuesday the House of Commons will pass eight private members' bills respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

The committee schedule for next week is already quite substantial and there will, of course, be additions to this list. On Monday the Special Committee on Science Policy will meet when the Senate rises. On Tuesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet in camera at 9.30 a.m., on the subject matter of Bill C-16; the National Finance Committee has called an in camera meeting, at 9.30 a.m. on the estimates of the Department of Public Works; the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will consider Bill C-25, the Human Rights Act, at 11.00 a.m. and 2.30 p.m.; and the Transport and Communications Committee will meet on Bill C-41, the Maritime Code, at 9.30 a.m. and 2.30 p.m.

On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-42, and the Agriculture Committee will hold an in camera meeting on the beef industry at 3.30 p.m., or when the Senate rises.

On Thursday at 9.30 a.m. the National Finance Committee will hold another in camera meeting on Public Works, and the subcommittee on Health, Welfare and Science, appointed to consider prenatal and early childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour, will meet at the same time.

Motion agreed to.

KINGSMERE

RESIDENCE OF SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS— QUESTION

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I would ask that the terms and conditions of the last will and testament, or any other document for that matter that was not a donation mortis causa, of the late Prime Minister Mackenzie King, which deeded Kingsmere, his estate, to the Canadian government, presumably—and I am not so sure whether this is so—for the exclusive use of the Speaker of the House of Commons, if it be personal or for state occasions, be made known. I would also ask whether the decedent, the late Prime Minister, entertained in this said document any conditions as to the use of the private residence. This would relate to the essential paragraphs of such documents regarding that particular transfer to the government and conditions applicable to the user thereof.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the nature of the question will be investigated.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DECISION OF CANADA LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD RE CERTIFICATION OF INDIVIDUAL BANK BRANCHES AS BARGAINING AGENTS—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, in view of the decision of the Canada Labour Relations Board of Tuesday, June 14, 1977, that on the basis of the present Canada Labour Code it was appropriate to establish an individual bank branch as a certified bargaining unit, has the government given consideration to whether such a system of certification will ensure reasonable harmony in labour relations within the Canadian banking system and assure banking service without interruption to the public? Is the government prepared to state whether it approves the policy of certifying individual branches, or is the matter under review?

Most particularly I would ask the leader to advise whether the government is prepared to countenance strike action in the banking system, or whether compulsory arbitration is being considered as a matter of public convenience and necessity.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question must be taken as notice.

Senator Grosart: It should be ignored.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION (SCIENTIFIC ACTIVITIES) BILL, 1976

THIRD READING

Senator Carter moved third reading of Bill C-26, respecting the organization of certain scientific activities of the Government of Canada, as amended.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Carter was good enough to inform me that he had received an answer to one of the questions I asked when the report of the committee was under consideration yesterday. This is a document of one page, containing information which, as far as I know, has not yet been published in summary form. It refers to the specific appropriations and other funds available to the councils that are discussed in that bill.

I would ask Senator Carter if it is his intention to suggest that this information be published or in some way made available to the general public.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Grosart for his inquiry. I received this information under three headings, as follows:

- (i) The parliamentary appropriations for the grants and scholarship program of the granting councils for 1977-78.
- (ii) The distribution of the appropriation for 1977-78 within the Canada Council between the arts and social sciences and humanities programs.
- (iii) The source of Canada Council funds—appropriations and the council's own funds (endowments, bequests, carry-over).

Honourable senators, a table was attached to the information which I received and I would ask permission to have it placed in Hansard at this point.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

TRANSPORTATION

POSSIBLE CNR LINK WITH FAIRBANKS, ALASKA—QUESTION

Leave having been given to revert to Question Period:

Senator Austin: Would the government leader advise whether reports made to the British Columbia Royal Commission on the British Columbia Railway are correct? Those reports are to the effect that the Canadian government is studying, with officials of the United States, and particularly with state officials of Alaska, the construction of a railway which would link the Canadian National Railways system with the city of Fairbanks, Alaska.

● (1420)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can confirm that there is correspondence on that particular subject, but it is not material which I have immediately at hand. For that reason, I shall have to take the question as notice and provide a more complete reply at a later date.

PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS MONITORING BILL

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the Bill S-4, intituled: "An Act to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada".—(Honourable Senator Hayden).

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Hayden, I move the adoption of the report.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask Senator Barrow to explain the proposed amendments.

Senator Barrow: I should be glad to attempt to do so. There are six proposed amendments, the first of which is to clause 6, as follows:

"(5) Where the Minister proposes to disclose information pursuant to subsection (4) in a form that identifies or permits the identification of the corporation to which the information relates, he shall so notify the corporation and afford it a reasonable opportunity to make representations as to the effect the disclosure of the information might have on the corporation's competitive position."

Representations were made to the committee that it would be eminently unfair for the minister to disclose information concerning a company without giving that company the opportunity to make representations to the minister. The committee agreed with those representations and so amended the bill.

The second amendment relates to clause 9(2). It is a fairly lengthy amendment, so I shall not read it. In essence, the amendment uses the actual wording of the relevant provisions of the Income Tax Act instead of incorporating them by reference, as is provided in subsection 9(2). This relates mainly to the return of documents, books, records, and so forth, and provides for access thereto and for supplying of copies thereof to the companies from whom they were taken.

The amendment to clause 11 arose because it was the view of the committee that errors could be made unwittingly, and that if such were the case neither the company nor its officials should be penalized. Hence, the words "it knows" were added to subparagraphs (i) and (ii) of clause 11.

Clause 12 was amended to comply with the previous amendments proposed. The final amendment to the bill is to schedule I. Husky Oil Operations Ltd. appeared before the committee and indicated that the name of the U.S. parent had been used in error and requested that a change be made to substitute "Husky Oil Operations Ltd.," for the name of the U.S. parent as it appeared in schedule I.

Senator Bell: Thank you very much, Senator Barrow. I think the committee did an excellent job in its consideration of Bill S-4. However, the amendments, to my mind—and, I am sure, to the minds of other senators—present many questions. For that reason, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Bell, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONSIDERATION OF THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Third Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Lafond).

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, I tabled this report at the time as Acting Co-Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. Since that date, which now seems long ago, our co-chairman has returned to us hale and hearty, and has agreed to make the presentation. I believe it is proper that this item be adjourned in his name.

Order stands.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1977

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-58, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1978.

He said: Honourable senators, at the outset, I would like to remind you that I have caused to be distributed photocopies of four tables having to do with this bill. The first table is entitled

"1977-78 Appropriation Act No. 3, 1977," and it gives a summary of the first appropriation act passed in respect of the main estimates—Appropriation Act No. 2, 1977, which granted interim supply for April, May and June, including additional proportions for 21 votes in the main estimates—and also the present bill, Appropriation Bill No. 3, 1977, for granting full supply for the balance of the main estimates for 1977-78. On the reverse of this first sheet of paper there is another table entitled, "Estimates 1977-78," giving the main estimates under the two headings of "Budgetary" and "Non-Budgetary" estimates. They are broken down into three columns—the amounts to be voted, the statutory votes, and the total of those two previous columns. The third and fourth pages contain a French translation of the first two.

The bill before the house today provides, as I have already briefly mentioned, for the release of the balance of the main estimates for 1977-78, amounting to $14.101 billion, in round figures. These estimates were tabled on February 17, and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the same date. Interim supply for 1977-78 was approved by Appropriation Act No. 2, 1977, which provided for the expenditures for the months of April, May and June, and included appropriations for all 313 votes, plus additional appropriations for some 21 votes.

The main estimates were discussed with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials on March 29 and 31, and again with the officials of Treasury Board on June 28.

Here I would like to refer honourable senators to the excellent report tabled on June 15 by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, outlining in detail the study of these estimates and, also, the recommendations of the committee.

• (1430)

I would like to add that the present bill does not contain any additional borrowing authority, and it is in the usual form of supply bills of previous years. I recommend this bill to the favourable consideration of this chamber.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

CLERESTORY OF THE SENATE CHAMBER

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Special Senate Committee on the Clerestory of the Senate Chamber which was presented on Wednesday, June 8, 1977.

Hon John J. Connolly moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, this committee has been known in the Senate by many names, including the "cholesterol committee". I do know, however, that a good many senators felt that a new word was introduced into the English language when the proposal was first made in this chamber. I think that if I had to give a special name to this committee I would call it the "Windex committee," because it proposed to clean up the windows.

As honourable senators may remember, the original committee was appointed in January 1975, and in the long period of time since then it has had only eight meetings. This was due partly to the fact that other committees of the Senate were busy almost continuously, and it was difficult to get members of the committee to attend meetings because of their commitment to other committees.

We heard an excellent group of witnesses. We heard two eminent historians in the persons of the President of the Canadian Historical Association, Dr. Monet, from the University of Ottawa, and the Immediate Past-President of that society, Dr. Careless, from the University of Toronto. We heard artists in stained glass, Miss Yvonne Williams of Toronto and Mr. Gerald Tooke of Ottawa, and a number of architects from the Department of Public Works came to give us advice. We also heard representatives from the National Gallery in the persons of the then director, Dr. Jean Boggs, and Dr. Hubbard and Mr. Ostiguy. We also had the benefit of the views of the present Clerk of the Senate, Mr. Fortier, and his immediate predecessor, Mr. John MacNeill.

I would say that the cost of the operation of the committee was kept within very reasonable limits. I think we had to pay the travel expenses of two witnesses who came from Toronto. We had no special printing of the report, which appears in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate as well as in the Debates of the Senate of Wednesday, June 8.

On behalf of the committee, I thank all these distinguished witnesses for their assistance. The committee is also indebted to Miss Eleanor Milne, who acted as its adviser and attended all of its public meetings.

In thanking the members of the committee, I must mention two or three who did some special work over and above that of the other members. Senator Forsey and Senator Carter acted, with me, as a subcommittee to draft the report. Senator Deschatelets did some valuable extra-curricular work, particularly in respect of the translation of the report.

I should mention also that Mr. Georges Coderre of the Committees Branch did invaluable work for us. And I really would be remiss if I did not thank my own secretary, Miss Jean Kerr, who typed redraft after redraft of this rather difficult type of report, and did many other things for the committee, for which we are all grateful.

I hope all honourable senators will read this report. I think it makes good reading, particularly if you want to put yourselves to sleep at night. It is useful, I think, for one particular reason, which is that it establishes—and this is on the basis of evidence given the committee by the Clerk and the former Clerk—that in a matter of this kind, which involves a major change in the precincts of the Senate, it is the senators themselves who are in charge. That is an extremely important point.

When it came to the windows, we heard a great deal of evidence on what might be done. You will have to read the evidence before deciding for yourselves whether the conclusion we reached is the right one. My personal view is that we did reach the right conclusion. We now feel that the design of the windows in the upper part of this chamber should reflect the ethnic composition of the Canadian people. My hope is that when Canadians, both young and old, visit Parliament and come into the Senate chamber, whether they are English, French, Irish, Scottish, Welsh, German, Ukrainian or Polish, they will be able to look up there and say, "I am part of the group that is represented by that window." They would feel recognized as part of the ethnic composition of this country, and would be able to say, "We are there. We are part of Canada and we are recognized as such."

We are told by the artists that if that is done with those windows there will not be any conflict with the symbolism in the ceiling, which represents the founding races of the country—the French, the English, the Scottish, the Irish and the Welsh.

After considerable study, the committee concluded there should not be too much detail in the upper windows; that the stress should be laid upon colour rather than upon individual depiction. We feel that colour should be the dominating feature of the windows, and that the ethnic groups depicted should be represented in a symbolic way.

These windows are so small in relation to their height and distance from the floor that any figures contained in them would hardly be recognizable. The committee feels that if the windows are to contain symbolism, then booklets describing each of them, and containing colour illustrations, should be made available.

Quite early in its deliberations, the committee decided that it could not make a valid report to the Senate based only on the windows, feeling it was necessary to consider the chamber as a whole in order to avoid misleading either the present or future generations of senators. In other words, the windows cannot be treated in isolation—the walls, the Throne area and the architecture of the chamber have to be studied together with the windows and other elements which might have to be altered from time to time.

The committee sought and received expert advice on the possibility of using murals to replace the existing pictures, and the possibility of using tapestries instead of murals. It also had expert advice on the types of thematic material which could be adopted, if these pictures were to be replaced by a new form of decoration. That advice also extended to the composition of the elements which might be used, and the style or treatment that might be applied. In its assessment of the matter the committee concluded that with respect to theme or composition there were two alternatives. One was a parliamentary theme, and the other was a theme devoted to the primacy of the law, both of which would be appropriate for our chamber. Indeed, the second theme has already been used in the House of Lords, although in a rather sketchy manner. The parliamentary theme, so we have been given to understand, would be a difficult one for artists to work with owing to the repetitiveness of the material which would have to be used.

In that connection, honourable senators, I would urge you to read Head V of the report, with particular reference to paragraphs 20 to 22, and 23 to 34.

The committee was most impressed with the suggestion made by Mr. Ostiguy of the National Gallery that tapestries placed on the walls below the stained glass windows and above the beautifully carved woodwork would produce a magnificent result. These would be appropriate tapestries depicting one or other of the themes we thought most appropriate. As a matter of fact, for a long time the members of the committee felt that tapestries would indeed offer the best solution. However, when the officials of the Department of Public Works appeared before us at our last meeting, Mr. Desbarats, the Assistant Deputy Minister, and the architects he brought with him, presented some new ideas. They produced a most useful document which contained sketches of this chamber which were drawn by the original architect, Mr. John Pearson, in the earlier part of this century. Those sketches have been appended to our report, and they should prove useful to anyone studying the chamber because they show exactly what Mr. Pearson was trying to do.

As honourable senators are aware, Mr. Pearson's sketches of the east and west walls imply the installation of galleries. That concept has been discarded for various reasons. For one thing, the addition of those galleries would not likely be important to Parliament, particularly in the light of the use of television. The proceedings here are televised on such state occasions as the opening of Parliament, and by this means command a far greater audience than could be accommodated in any galleries. In short, it does not appear that the original concept of galleries on the east and west sides of the chamber will be developed.

However, Mr. Pearson's sketches were assessed by the committee. One suggestion put forward by the officials was to paint sketches upon the walls of the Senate chamber between the windows and the wood paneling—a process called trompe-l'œil. I think the committee as a whole found that idea quite distasteful. In the first place, it would cost at least a quarter of a million dollars to complete, and still would not really be a genuine element in the chamber. For those, and perhaps other reasons, the committee rejected the idea.

The committee concluded that Mr. Pearson's sketches could be realized if the stone could be installed and his three upper Gothic arches would fit into each of those large areas on the east wall containing the beautiful coloured stone fluted columns which hold up the arches and which are all part of the Gothic architecture. We originally thought that if those arches were installed—the word “arch” is not the correct one; there is another word which escapes me—but if the “arches” were installed, then behind them, instead of openings to a gallery, there would be a stone face. An example of that kind of construction is to be found in the south gallery on the east side, where the arches were carried over from the window level when the chamber was completed. There are other Gothic arches in the lobby of the Senate chamber, just outside where the public is admitted, and those arches are comprised of much smaller and more beautiful fluted columns, and again they are contained within even larger arches. Perhaps something like that could be considered for installation here. It might have an effect which the Senate, generally, would find appropriate.

● (1450)

However, we are still faced with the problem of whether or not it would be suitable to have within those new arches, if they are to be installed, simply the flat stone facing. Your committee felt that consideration should be given to another alternative. There is on the staff of the Public Works Department Miss Milne, who has done so much of the carving in this building and who was responsible particularly for the carving in the ante-chamber of the House of Commons. If she could do, in high relief, the kind of carving that she did there, using one of the themes proposed in the report, we would surely have something of which parliamentarians would be proud, and which would be an inspiration for all Canadians.

The writing in the report is restrained. We have tried to avoid explaining the obvious, but I think you will find a good deal implied, a good deal of thought between the lines.

Let me deal for a moment with the firm recommendations of the committee. We are firm in our recommendation about the windows, which I have already described. We have made only suggestions as guidelines, on what might be done with the walls. We have recommended—and on this we are firm—that the whole subject matter be further discussed by an interdepartmental committee, which in turn should report its findings to a committee of the Senate, so that the Senate at all times will have control over what is proposed. We believe that the Minister of Public Works should be the executive authority, and his department the executive group, to carry out whatever changes are decided upon.

We recommend that the Minister of Public Works should, as various steps are taken in any of those areas, report to both the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate in order that there may be liaison between those three persons; and that from time to time, as the Leader of the Government receives information from the Minister of Public Works concerning proposals for proceeding with this work, he report to the Senate on the information he receives.

Honourable senators, I hope the report will be adopted. Whatever its shortcomings, it assures that the Senate will be able to influence any contemplated major changes within its precincts. It is also my hope that the work of the committee will have contributed toward making the Senate chamber a place worthy of the importance and dignity of Parliament for all Canadians.

Senator Rowe: I believe the honourable senator has answered the question I had in mind to ask. He mentioned an interdepartmental committee. I take it that he was referring to the Department of Public Works?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. That was mentioned by the officials who appeared before the committee from time to time. The interdepartmental committee would probably consist of representatives of the Department of Public Works, the National Gallery and any other department of government that can contribute ideas and expertise with respect to the proposed changes.

Senator Macdonald: May I ask the honourable senator whether the committee considered the furnishings of the chamber? For example, was any consideration given to doing away with the old-fashioned desks, or to providing better and more attractive uniforms for our pages, Clerks and the Speaker?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I must confess to Senator Macdonald that the committee did not consider that matter. The committee is speaking only tentatively about the walls of the Throne area. It was authorized only to report on the windows. However, it found that to study them in isolation might well result in serious mistakes. Therefore, the committee felt it should make a firm recommendation about the windows, and then provide guidelines as to further work after the windows had been completed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, may I be permitted just a few words? First of all, I would like to say that we should be very grateful to our colleague, Senator Connolly, because the report we have before us today is the result of an original idea he had. The project he went into thoroughly and the studies that were made proved very important for the present and the future.

I just want to say that the windows in the House of Commons were redone just a few years ago. I must repeat what Senator Connolly said earlier, because I hope honourable senators will read this extremely interesting report carefully. Of course it should be realized that the work in the Parliament buildings is not over and might never be completed.

Amounts appear every year in the estimates of the Department of Public Works to allow the work to be continued in the original sense that architect Pearson had in mind, for example, so that I was very surprised one day to be told by a world renowned architect that our Parliament buildings are almost unique in the world because of the quality of the stone sculpture. I believe that apart from the windows one of the major recommendations of that committee is to have the stone sculpture in this house continued, which would surely make it an extremely rich object and would meet, I am sure, the wish of Canadians from all provinces who visit Parliament in increasing numbers every year.

So that original idea of Senator Connolly, which started with the improvement of the windows, is proving with the testimonies of the historians, sculptors and artists we heard, to be much more important than we thought at first. I know that this project is not imminent, that there is no question of approving this report today, but it is very important that all honourable senators acquaint themselves with the very thorough project of that committee, and that will, I am sure, provide good reading material for all.

Once again I must say that Senator Connolly already has several feathers in his cap but this report is for him a rather extraordinary thing, and in years to come we will always be grateful to him for it.

[English]

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Honourable senators, I was very surprised to observe in appendix "A" to the report of the committee that in the Gothic arch was a statue, not of Queen Victoria but of a crusader or a Norseman or some such person, and I thought, "What on earth are we doing in removing the statue of Queen Victoria?" Because our terms of reference did not include the area immediately behind the Throne. I was relieved, however, when Senator Connolly assured me that this was not going to happen, and I was further reassured today when he said that there will be an ongoing study and that the full Senate will have a voice in any final decision.

Now, it is no secret that I regret that the red canopy and drapes were removed from the Throne area and are no longer present in the Senate chamber. Someone told me that I am old fashioned. Sure I am, but I don't apologize to anyone for wanting to retain the traditional symbols of this august chamber. Many senators have spoken to me about the removal of the canopy, and I am sure that Senator Connolly himself will recall the disappointment voiced about this in committee by Miss Milne. I made certain inquiries at the time. I asked Major Vandelac, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, why the drapes had been removed, thinking that perhaps they had been sent out to be cleaned. He informed me that Governor General and Madam Leger had agreed—I believe those were his words—that it would be proper to have the canopy and drapes removed.

I also spoke to Madam Speaker about it. Now, I would not do anything in the world to offend either Madam Speaker or Senator Connolly, both of whom have been extremely kind to me. I will never forget how kind Senator Connolly was following the death of my husband. But, honourable senators, I believe that I introduced a rather discordant note into the deliberations of the committee by inquiring how this change came about. I understand that some other senators have spoken to Madam Speaker about it, and perhaps a questionnaire should be sent to all members of the Senate, asking for their opinion.

Senator Benidickson: Hear, hear.

Senator Quart: By this means we could get a consensus of opinion. This is certainly not a political matter, but I feel strongly that we should retain some of the traditions that we have in this chamber and not let all our symbols disappear one by one.

I had not intended to speak today; in fact, when our Whip, Senator Macdonald, asked me if I was going to move the adjournment of the debate, I replied that I was upset and did not intend to speak to it at all. However, being a woman I changed my mind, and I have told you just how I feel.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the question of the appointment of Senators.—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I had intended to proceed this afternoon, but in view of the fact that this is an inquiry of the Leader of the Opposition, I feel that he should be present when I respond. I would therefore ask that this order stand.

Order stands.

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST DAY

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment may I on behalf of all honourable senators extend to all Canadians of French descent our very best wishes on the occasion of St. John the Baptist Day.

[Translation]

On the occasion of the national day of all French-speaking Canadians, I want to take this opportunity to extend to them on my behalf and on behalf of the Senate of Canada our best wishes for a happy St. John The Baptist Day.

[English]

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 27, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, June 27, 1977

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier) had been substituted for that of Mr. Fleming on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

PRIVATE BILL

CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-1001, to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa-West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of document respecting Working Arrangement between the United States Internal Revenue Service and the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, under the terms of the Canada-U.S. Reciprocal Tax Convention, issued by the Department of National Revenue.

Copies of letter from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the Minister of Energy and Natural Resources of the Government of Alberta, dated June 17, 1977, and exchange of letters between the two ministers, dated June 20, 1977, respecting oil and natural gas pricing.

Copies of Order of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, respecting compensation plan between M & T Chemicals Ltd. (formerly M & T Products of Canada Ltd.) Hamilton, Ontario and the group of its hourly-rated employees. Order dated June 22, 1977.

Report on proceedings under the Canada Labour Code, Part III (Labour Standards), for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1977, pursuant to section 75 of the said Code, Chapter L-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the President of the National Research Council of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1977, pursuant to section 16 of the National Research Council Act, Chapter N-14, R.S.C., 1970.

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, June 28, 1977, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GREAT LAKES WATER QUALITY AGREEMENT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Robichaud asked a question on June 2 with respect to the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement and implementation thereof. His question was:

On April 15, 1972, the Governments of Canada and the United States signed a Great Lakes water quality agreement whereby the two countries agreed that programs and other measures to achieve the accepted water quality objectives for the lakes would be either completed or in the process of implementation by December 31, 1975. The two governments also agreed to conduct a comprehensive review of the operation and effectiveness of the agreement during the fifth year after its coming into force. I therefore ask:

1. Have the two governments lived up to their commitments in relationship to the December 31, 1975 date?
2. Will the two governments conduct a comprehensive review of the agreement, and, if so, what procedures are to be followed in order to accomplish this?

The answer to the first part of the question is:

1. The International Joint Commission's Great Lakes Water Quality Board observed, in its 1975 report, "Both Parties have substantially met the requirement under Article V to have municipal sewage treatment programs either completed or in the process of implementation by December 31, 1975." The board went on to comment that it recognized this as one of the first major achievements towards restoration of water quality in the Great Lakes. The report also noted that by December 31, 1981, it is expected that all sewered population in the Great Lakes system will be provided with adequate treatment. Canada should achieve 100 per cent completion by the end of 1977.

As for industrial pollution abatement programs, the Water Quality Board report stated that, with a few exceptions, the requirements under the agreement had been met by governments and that the program emphasis had shifted from development of guidelines and related administrative requirements to monitoring, surveillance and enforcement.

Similar satisfactory progress has been made on the other programs and measures under the agreement.

The answer to the second part of Senator Robichaud's question is:

Work on the comprehensive fifth year review of the operation and effectiveness of the agreement commenced last fall in the Canadian government. On April 13, 1977, the first Canada-U.S. meeting on the review took place in Washington. At that meeting it was agreed that since 1972 substantial progress had been made under the agreement but that much remained to be done. It was further agreed that the review should entail an in-depth assessment of all of the measures undertaken by the two countries to restore the Lakes and keep them healthy. The April 13 meeting established a bilateral steering group to coordinate Canadian and U.S. activities in the review. This steering group has subsequently agreed to establish bilateral working groups to examine the various technical aspects of the agreement. The Department of Fisheries and the Environment in cooperation with the Province of Ontario will be holding public meetings in Toronto and Thunder Bay in mid-July to allow opportunities for the public to express views on the operation of the agreement to date. Similar meetings were held in the United States during the month of June. It is anticipated that the review will be completed by the end of the year.

KINGSMERE

RESIDENCE OF SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked on June 23 by Senator Ewasew with respect to Kingsmere as the residence of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I have been advised that the late Prime Minister Mackenzie King left his estates in the Gatineau Park to the people of Canada. They have been, effectively, under the good offices of the National Capital Commission since that time.

On January 1, 1970, the Official Residences Act came into force, whereby a certain parcel of land, 4.31 acres, with one farm house thereon was set aside for maintenance as a residence for the Speaker of the House of Commons.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

RETIREMENT OF PERSONNEL—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, finally, I have a reply to the following question asked by Senator Smith (Colchester) on June 22:

Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government whether the government has currently under consideration measures designed to alleviate the hardships suffered by members of the armed forces, especially other ranks, required to retire from the forces because of age?

I am able to tell the house that the matter is currently under consideration. The question of removing the age and service qualifications for the receipt of escalation payments has been raised in the other place on a number of occasions since these provisions came into effect. However, up to the present time the government could not see its way clear to changing the basis on which the benefits for retired members of the armed forces and the RCMP were escalated. Assurance has been given that consideration would be given to the matter, and I can repeat that assurance at this time.

Honourable senators may be aware that comprehensive studies of pensions have been initiated by the government and are now under way. First, there is a comprehensive review of all aspects of the government's pension policy and the pension situation in the private sector which is being carried out jointly by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Finance. Secondly, the government has engaged an outside actuarial study of the pension issues of the plans covering its employees. As the President of the Treasury Board, the Honourable Mr. Andras, has explained in the other place, the results of these studies will assist the government in determining what the various alternatives respecting the pension plans will be.

THE CROWN

REVENUES—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government when I may expect an answer to a question I asked so long ago I have forgotten the date. It had to do with the casual revenues of the Crown, and other revenues available to the government, apart from money voted by Parliament.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hate to use the word "search," but I shall attempt to determine where in the process of reply it happens to be at this time. Often answers requiring statistical data take longer to prepare than those dealing with general policy.

Senator Forsey: I think in this case perhaps the relevant officials may have borrowed the team of snails employed by the post office.

PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS MONITORING BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the Bill S-4, intituled: "An Act to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada".—(Honourable Senator Bell).

Senator Barrow: I move the adoption of the report.

Senator Flynn: Is Senator Bell not here?

● (2020)

Senator Petten: Perhaps I could clarify the situation. Senator Bell cannot be with us this evening, but if any other senator wishes to take part in this debate she is perfectly agreeable. If, however, nobody else wishes to take part in the debate, she is prepared to have the matter proceed.

Senator Flynn: I am willing to take the word of Senator Petten.

Senator Petten: Thank you.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I wish to speak on this report. I do with some reluctance, because I was remiss in not recognizing a serious flaw in this bill before the end of the committee proceedings. None of the witnesses who appeared before the committee made any reference to the point I wish to mention, and for that reason this legislative flaw was probably not dealt with by the committee.

This bill refers only to companies with an income and a capitalization over a certain amount. I cannot recall offhand what those amounts are. It is an income of $5 million, or something of that nature. The measure, therefore, applies only to companies above that limit.

In the next clause the bill provides that it will apply to companies referred to in Schedules I and II, and thereafter goes on to provide that the names of companies may be added to Schedules I and II, or companies named in Schedules I or II may be deleted, by order in council.

I do not think it takes any great cognition to recognize that this is a very dangerous piece of legislation. The generic definition of the companies to which this bill shall apply is included, but thereafter it applies to the companies named only in the two schedules. I cannot understand why any legislative draftsman would put those two matters side by side because, in a sense, if he wishes the bureaucracy to be able to administer the bill under the schedules he has delimited it by putting a generic threshold in the preceding clause. Basically, the draftsmanship leaves much to be desired.

Having made further inquiries into the reason for this anomaly after the committee meeting, and having received a reply—and an honest reply—from responsible officials to the effect that it was done for the purposes of administrative expediency, I should thereafter have asked that the bill be referred back to the committee. I did not do so because of the time frame in which we are now operating, and because of the fact that this bill is primarily an information-gathering bill. It is not one that imposes a tax, and it requires nothing other than the furnishing of information to the government.

I speak tonight merely to put on the record my opinion that the form of this legislation violates some very fundamental principles of draftsmanship, and offends in a very real sense the rule of law.

Senator Walker: Did the honourable senator examine any of the witnesses from the department to ascertain why there is this discrepancy?

Senator Lang: Yes, I did, and I gave you their reply that it was for purposes of administrative expediency.

Senator Walker: I thought that was your reply.

Senator Lang: No, that was out of the mouths of our friends.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Flynn: Next sitting. We have no choice.

Senator Barrow moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL UNITY

REGIONAL ASPIRATIONS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C. calling the attention of the Senate to the question of meeting more effectively the economic and cultural aspirations of the various regions of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: I yield to Senator Molson.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: I thank my friend, Senator Petten, for making it possible for me to continue this debate. I should like to make my remarks tonight because of certain other commitments.

Honourable senators, these days a dark cloud is hanging over our heads, and it is reflected in the sombre views of many Canadians when thinking of the future of their country. Bear in mind the fact that Canada has long emerged from being a frontier colony into the society of nations. It is respected, but not feared, for the part it has played in world affairs, and is the envy of many for the high economic standards it has achieved. This debate concerns itself with a crisis threatening the future of this country. Divisive forces are at work in different regions of Canada, to which we must respond vigorously. I suggest to you that the most serious situation is that posed by the announced objective of the Quebec government to separate from the rest of the country.

The speeches delivered so far in this debate have been truly excellent; they have lived up to the high standards which the Senate displays. I would like to add a few thoughts, as one who is an English-Canadian, whose family has become completely immersed in its homeland of Quebec. I am Québécois. I am in complete sympathy with the objective of preserving the French culture and language, and making the French language the prime language throughout Quebec. However, there is evidence of concern on the part of both Anglo- and Franco-Québécois over the means proposed to accomplish this goal.

As a Québécois, I have the right to express my feelings, and my comments are, therefore, of a personal nature.

[Translation]

Why do I claim to be Québécois? The answer is obvious. It is just on 200 years ago that my family gave up all other allegiance and made its home there. In the years since, six generations, with the seventh approaching maturity, have participated in the development of Quebec, including some of the original ventures in steam navigation, railways, banking, manufacturing, water and light services, schools, hospitals, universities, the arts and research. This recital is not to seek recognition, but to substantiate the claim that our roots are very deep indeed in the soil of Quebec.

In addition, two generations, with their contemporaries, have backed their faith and affection for this land with their lives. We too have some French blood in our veins, going back through the Taschereau, de la Bruère and de la Gorgendière families to Louis Jolliet. Today it seems that in spite of this history, we Anglophones are to be treated as strangers who have had all the privileges over the years, but are now to be deprived of fundamental rights.

• (2030)

[English]

This fear was only heightened by events of last week. The government paper entitled "A National Understanding—The Official Languages of Canada" was a well constructed, if somewhat verbose, statement which seemed to support the principles of human rights. However, first the Secretary of State, and then the Prime Minister, qualified the paper. One disturbing feature of that paper is the way in which statistics are used. I do not for a moment suggest that there was any attempt to mislead, but the effect is disquieting.

I refer to page 41 where a table of 1971 population figures is displayed under the heading "Official Language Minority Groups (Population by Mother Tongue)". The first line of this table shows the population of Canada as being 21,568,000-odd, with a minority population of 1,715,000-odd, being 8 per cent. The fifth line of the table shows Quebec with a population of 6,027,000-odd, and a minority population of 789,000-odd, or 13.1 per cent.

Those figures seem simple, but I draw attention to the heading, which is "Official Language Minority Groups"—it is not "language minorities." Those figures might lead the unwary to think that the number of people in Quebec who use, or might want to use, the minority language, English, is 789,000-odd. But what about the Italians, the Greeks, the Chinese, the Jews, the Germans, and others?

On page 17 of the paper, one paragraph gives the following figures: 13 million Canadians whose mother tongue is English, or 60 per cent; 5.8 million Canadians whose mother tongue is French, or 27 per cent; 2.7 million Canadians whose mother tongue is one of 20 languages, or 13 per cent. It further states on that page that 926,400 Canadians of French mother tongue live outside Quebec. By taking the figure of 5.8 million Francophones in total and subtracting from it the 926,400 Francophones who live outside Quebec, we are left with 4,873,600 Francophones in Quebec. The Quebec population, according to the table on page 41, is 6,027,760, of which, as I just said, 4,873,600 are French-speaking, leaving 1,154,160 non-French—not 789,000, as may be suggested, but 1,154,160 people who may have an interest in English language rights. That is 19 per cent, a significant minority. Now, these, as I mentioned, are 1971 figures. If one might take a guess today, that figure is something like one and a quarter million people to whom English schooling is to be denied—19 per cent of the population.

Last week there were a number of headlines with the same indications, that the federal government was willing to abandon some of the Quebec Anglophones' rights. The first I have is as follows: "Ottawa drops 'a bombshell' on Bill One foes." The first paragraph reads:

The Trudeau government has pulled the rug out from under Quebec parents fighting for the right to choose the language of instruction for their school-aged children.

It is a reasonably long article and I should just like to quote one other paragraph from it, the second to last which says:

However, it is still a severe blow to the Québécois—mainly Anglophone and immigrant—who have been appearing before the National Assembly Committee fighting for a continuation of their 110-year right to choose schools for their children.

The second clipping I have, which appeared about the same day last week, is from an editorial which gave praise to the language paper under the heading "Encouraging language paper." Again the second to last paragraph said:

No argument against Bill One's restrictive provisions would, we suspect, outweigh in Premier Lévesque's estimation this implied moral approval from Ottawa. Such approval may not be what Mr. Roberts and his colleagues have in mind; but this certainly is the effect created.

As I have said, there were many news items about that time, but I have no intention of reading more than just a few of them. The third clipping I have says: "PQ has right to restrict English: PM". The first paragraph reads:

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau suggested yesterday that Quebec has the right to limit enrolment in English schools until the other provinces build more French schools.

It is true that the Prime Minister said in Matane last week that the government was not abandoning the Anglo-Québécois. I accept his word, naturally, but how do you think Anglo-Québécois feel at this moment? How would you feel if some of your pre-Confederation rights—not new rights or greater freedom, but rights you had historically—were to be deferred?

I submit that the only policy which the federal government can declare is one which supports the provinces in all reasonable, beneficial acts, and which excepts any which reduce or withdraw any human freedoms.

Our concern stems from the moves to downgrade the Anglophone community and to reduce or restrict its numbers as a means to protect the French language and culture. Some of the legislative proposals are unnecessary and undesirable because in the long run the whole population of Quebec, French as well as English, will be the losers.

Over the last 15 years, significant progress has been made in the use of the French language. The proof is visible as Anglo-Québécois are at last learning French, as French is now commonly the language of work, and as the number of management positions occupied by Francophones has increased at a pronounced rate.

Back in 1856, Sir George Etienne Cartier saw our people thus:

[Translation]

This is how I view the diversity of the races in British North America: we are of different races, not intending to fight one another but to struggle in rivalry for the common good.

[English]

● (2040)

However, my greatest concern is caused by the serious misunderstandings between the English and French communities. Neither group really understands the inner feelings of the other and, more importantly, neither wants to admit that there is any fault on its part. While it is true that it was difficult for us to learn French properly when I was young, because the school system under the laws of the province did not permit the exchange of teachers between French Catholic and English Protestant schools, nevertheless, Anglophones have been guilty, without doubt, of not trying very hard to become fluent in the French language. They have not shown the proper interest, sympathy or understanding for the normal and healthy aspirations of the French community. We should have done a lot more over the years and even today in some areas of Canada there seems to be little real effort at sympathy for, and involvement in, the problems which are of such great importance to Quebec. English Canadians should realize how serious the issues are to the Quebec population. If Anglophones want Francophones to remain as partners, they must understand how vital and deep-rooted are the feelings of Francophones over their right to full self-expression and acceptance. Many would rather be poorer in their own country than continue to feel like second-class citizens in a greater one. Somehow this message must be more widely and more clearly understood.

[Translation]

On the French side, there should be recognition of the fact that historically business was the least respected occupation in which their people wanted to become involved. The church, the professions, government and politics all took precedence, and the educational system was limited by this point of view until a few years ago, although the realization of essential economic facts had led to the founding of higher schools of commerce several years ago.

No matter what used to be true, the belief that Anglophone business want to protect the good jobs for themselves and do not welcome Francophone associates is no longer valid. The contrary is true. In recent times, good Francophone candidates are welcomed with open arms.

[English]

Although a lack of recognition of our problems has caused serious difficulties, one has to be blind not to recognize how far we have come in the last 20 years. The rate of progress is such that I believe most complaints could be minimal before the next generation is born.

One thing must be understood by the people of Quebec. Anglophones do believe in their identity, their destiny and their homeland, from sea to sea, including Quebec. It should be fully accepted that the reason Canadians of all backgrounds made such great sacrifices in two world wars was because of that proud loyalty.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molson: Thus it is quite clear that if Quebec shatters the country, there will be no possibility of accommodation in currency, trade or other economic matters. The feelings after separation would be far too embittered.

[Translation]

Extreme measures, particularly those which may conflict with the Charter of Human Rights, such as the proposal to reduce the English language in the courts, in legislation, in Anglo schools and other bodies will only harm the whole fabric of Quebec. We are intelligent people and the present government is gifted with exceptionally high intellectual capacity and background. We cannot, therefore, fail to observe the serious damage which has already been caused by Bill 1 and by the determination to separate Canada as a country. Already national and international companies are finding it nearly impossible to move employees into Quebec. This is also the case with our hospitals and universities, in spite of a world-wide reputation for excellence. They cannot attract outstanding people when there is no assurance of educational rights for their children, or of the terms of qualification for their own employment. These institutions are already losing valuable and irreplaceable people.

[English]

Under the present circumstances we would not have benefited from the enormous contributions of Penfield, Rutherford, Osler, Selye and many other outstanding figures. Even the fields of art and athletics would lose some of their brilliant personalities. Why pretend? The quality of life in Quebec is already suffering. Furthermore, if one looks back with an open mind it is obvious that the greatest achievements in our province have been as a result of the combination of the best talents from English and French stock. When we reflect on the exploration and development of our country, the great feats of construction, Expo '67, the Olympics, the Montreal Metro and other outstanding accomplishments, we realize that success has been due to the combination of qualities of our two cultures.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molson: There is nothing political in what I am saying. If the Parti Québécois provides good government for our province, it will have our support. As I said, we have lived there a long time and we have no intention of moving. We love Quebec; we respect and like its people, and we feel we have won our place in the province. We want our future generations to continue there.

Our participation in the business community which started on Notre Dame Street East, Montreal, in 1786, has seen good times and bad. It has survived through years of war and peace, political change, boom and depression. It took nothing away from others, but it created new opportunities and new prospects in Quebec in what was then an industrial vacuum. I am quite confident that it will still be playing a useful role a great many years from now.

May I quote Abraham Lincoln:

You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift.
You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong.
You cannot further the brotherhood of man by encouraging class hatred. You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich.

Had he visited Quebec today he might have added: "You cannot improve the use of the French language by eliminating the English."

Sir Wilfrid Laurier did consider the question of the break-up of Canada in 1894, and I quote:

[Translation]

Be there among you a man who would really want to see Canada torn asunder, who would remove one small part of the heritage that was our forefathers' country?

[English]

I want to end by telling a little true anecdote. Last winter while in the south we saw the simple wooden shack of a poor man. One day he found that it was being infested by thousands of ants. He had no insect bombs or sprays so he thought of a way to solve the problem of the ants. He lit a piece of newspaper and started to burn them. He got rid of the ants but unfortunately he burned his house down.

I pray that we Québécois may find a way to solve our problems in a spirit of goodwill and to live together in harmony without burning down our home.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONSIDERATION OF THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Third Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was tabled Wednesday, May 11, 1977.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I shall speak very briefly on this subject, partly because of the pressure of time that we are under—although I may remark parenthetically that I share the view often expressed by many honourable senators that we ought not to be under such pressure of time with legislation of the importance that is now before us, and I can't help thinking that there is room for the application of the Hayden formula to a great many other kinds of legislation besides those to which it has already been applied. However, that is merely by the way.

It is not necessary to say very much about the third report of the Statutory Instruments Committee because it speaks for itself. Substantially what it does is to say that the raising of the postal rates, not by act of Parliament in the traditional way but by administrative order, is a grave invasion of the rights of Parliament.

I noticed that when the honourable deputy leader was discussing this matter—and I can't help feeling that perhaps he was a trifle out of order in discussing the third report in his speech on the second report; I am tempted to follow his somewhat dubious example in that respect by trying to answer his speech on the second report, but I think I had better refrain from any attempt to do so. I notice that he made some remark to the effect that we didn't really question the validity of this particular document, this particular statutory instrument, but merely said it was an unusual and unexpected use of the power under the Financial Administration Act.

Well, I think, if honourable senators will examine carefully the report and the appendix to it, or the schedule, or whatever it is called—I have forgotten the exact title; statement of reasons, I think, is the proper title—they will find that, in fact, the committee had very grave doubts about the validity of the instrument, but thought it better to emphasize rather the matter of principle, the setting of these new postal rates, the raising of the postal rates, not as the Post Office Act requires, and as has been the custom, I think, from time immemorial, or certainly for a very long time, by this instrument and not by act of Parliament.

That is the sum and substance of this, and we felt in the committee that it was necessary to draw the attention of Parliament to the fact that suddenly this matter, which should have been dealt with, in our judgment, and always has been dealt with, by act of Parliament, should not be dealt with in this way by a somewhat dubious use of the Financial Administration Act.

We have seen a great many invasions of the rights of Parliament by officialdom, and we have drawn attention to a considerable number of them. I hope we shall not have to draw attention to very many more, but I am afraid this hope is perhaps the triumph of hope over experience, judging by our experience in the Statutory Instruments Committee.

I don't think I need to say very much more about this now, but I hope that the Senate is becoming more and more alert to the fact that officials—and, of course, they do it under the umbrella of the ministers, the cabinet—are becoming more and more inclined to ride roughshod over the rights of Parliament; that they are becoming more and more inclined to tenir le haut du pavé, if I have the French expression correct; that they are becoming more and more inclined to act as if, after all, Parliament was not really of very much account; and if you can serve administrative expediency, as quoted a little while ago by the Honourable Senator Lang, well, after all, that's it, that's the most important thing. We take leave, in the Committee on Statutory Instruments, to think that it is not the most important thing, that administrative efficiency should take second place to the rights of Parliament.

Years and years and years ago in England, I believe it was Lord Haldane—Mr. Haldane as he then was—was walking home from a sitting of the House of Commons with a very distinguished English civil servant, and this particular civil servant said to him, "Well, after all, Haldane, you people in Parliament are not really of very much account or importance. We could run the whole country very well without you. In fact, we could run it probably better than you do." Haldane said, "Yes, my dear fellow, I have no doubt you could, and in a fortnight there wouldn't be enough lamp posts in Whitehall to go around." I think that message, perhaps, ought to be heard in good, loud, ringing tones by some of the officials in this country now.

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator permit a question? I wonder whether, taking to heart his very proper indictment of officialdom, he feels there are further powers that need to be enunciated within parliamentary enactment, or is it just a matter of those of us who sit in Parliament having the courage of our convictions and doing something more than report or complain when an occurrence such as this arises?

For instance, his own committee apparently has no teeth to do anything in a case such as this except report. In his view, should there be greater powers, either within his committee or, through his committee, within Parliament to prevent situations such as the encroachment of parliamentary powers by the bureaucracy from continuing as they have?

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, in answer to the question, I think that both the courses suggested in the question by the Honourable Senator Greene have to be followed. I think we need changes in the legislation. We need, for example, a clear and not a notably obscure definition of what is a statutory instrument and is therefore subject to scrutiny by the Statutory Instruments Committee. The definition section or subsection or paragraph in that act is of an obscurity such that the late Mr. Mackenzie King, a master of ambiguity and obscurity, could have taken the draftsman's correspondence course.

That is one thing. Another thing is something that we suggested in our report, in section W of our second report, that we should have more in this country of the affirmative and negative procedure on statutory instruments which they have in the United Kingdom, where the great majority of statutory instruments either do not come into effect until they have been approved by the two houses of Parliament or else, having come into effect, can be removed, can be annulled, can be disallowed, by action of the two houses of Parliament within a period varying, I think, from 28 to 40 days.

We are convinced these changes in legislation are necessary. But meanwhile—and the chances of our getting action on either of these things, I think, are rather remote, in the short term at all events; I hope I am too pessimistic on that. I think one thing that we have to do in this house, and what I think we are increasingly doing in dealing with legislation which comes before us, is to scrutinize very carefully the details and see that inordinate powers are not granted to the executive and that vague terms, which may lead to the possibility of the executive driving a coach and four through the intention of the legislation itself, should be avoided.

I should perhaps add parenthetically what I ought to have said originally, that I am not actually intending to hold the officials responsible. I think probably in a good many cases the officials are, in fact, the initiators of this; but, of course, the ministers are responsible.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator Forsey: The ministers cannot shove the responsibility off on to appointed officials. The appointed officials may be wrongly advising the ministers, but the ministers are responsible. That is another thing. The ministers should wake up to the fact that they are responsible, and should try to maintain more control over the appointed officials in their departments and not be led around by the nose by some of these smart cookies who dream up these provisions in the legislation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 3, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Flynn, calling the attention of the Senate to the question of the appointment of senators.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, on May 3 of this year the Leader of the Opposition set forth some of his views with respect to Senate appointments. At the outset I want to say that I join other senators in expressing sympathy concerning the problems that confront a small and hard-working opposition.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: The condition is not unknown to me. As former leader of an opposition group in British Columbia, I know that the problems posed in manning committees alone are very substantial. There is, therefore, no disagreement about the need to strengthen the opposition in the Senate, and I feel sure that if we were to put the matter to a vote there would be unanimous support for that view.

Over the past two years a series of meetings has been held with government supporters in the Senate, and I can report to the chamber that the consensus has emerged that opposition forces in this chamber should never be permitted to decline below a certain percentage figure, such as 25 or 30 per cent. This is the result of many individual meetings and conversations, not only with senators in regional discussions but with many senators individually. There is a conviction that, like all parliamentary assemblies, the Senate operates at its best when there is a reasonable balance between opposition and government supporters not only in this chamber, but in committees as well. Indeed, we need only review the history of this nation to see the parliamentary difficulties which appear to occur when governments are elected with overwhelming majorities. Huge majorities appear to pose more problems for the parliamentary system than the system is able to cope with and these difficulties have occurred, not only federally but provincially as well, in a number of elections in fairly recent history.

The Leader of the Opposition has suggested that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister has been unresponsive to the needs of the opposition. Yet the record indicates that on more than one occasion the Prime Minister has indicated a willingness to appoint Progressive Conservatives to the Senate. One such occasion was October 2, 1974, when the Prime Minister made a speech from which the Leader of the Opposition has already quoted in part, but a section of which I would like to place on the record once again. On that date the Prime Minister said:

Hon. members opposite talk about partisan appointments. This is a serious matter which I have already had the opportunity to discuss several years ago with the authorities of opposition parties, and I had then suggested, and I repeat my suggestion today, that if indeed the senators of the Progressive Conservative party, of the Tory party, who wish to retire from the Upper Chamber, refrain from doing so because they do not want to be replaced by Liberal senators, I repeat what I told several years ago to Senator Flynn who, if I am not mistaken, represents the opposition party in the Senate, that, for my part, I would readily appoint Progressive Conservatives to replace the Progressive Conservatives who voluntarily retire from the Upper Chamber. I am well aware, Mr. Speaker, that some of them accept my suggestion, but there were many more when I first made this offer several years ago, and if the official opposition party continues to act so speedily, they may be even fewer in four years.

It is a humble start but the House will certainly recall that several years ago the government had proposed a much more thorough reform of the Senate which involved provincial participation. But I will not talk about this today. If, in the context of our constitutional reform, we must come back to this subject, the government always has an open mind to discuss this problem.

The Prime Minister, too, in recent correspondence dated January 19 of this year, addressed to certain premiers—and I think honourable senators are aware of this correspondence, addressed, for example, to the Honourable William Davis and the Honourable Peter Lougheed—said, in part:

When we come to fundamental review of the Constitution, we will want to consider many things relating to the Senate. The federal government will have a number of proposals to make.

One proposal which has gone forth to the premiers is to increase the size of the Senate, the most recent figure that has been suggested being 124, ultimately. So the government is concerned with changes and reform in the Senate, including increased representation from some of the provinces. There is a lively interest in changes in the Senate.

I want to assure honourable senators that the Prime Minister and the government he leads remain actively concerned with the question of the Senate, the appointment of senators, and the possible restructuring of the methods by which appointments are made. Indeed, some honourable senators are aware that over recent weeks, in the area of Senate appointments from opposition ranks, there has been concerted effort to obtain additional proposed names from the opposition, and conversations have been held on this particular subject.

The other day, in his speech to this chamber, Senator Flynn made public the procedure outlined by the Prime Minister for appointment of senators from the ranks of the opposition. This procedure would involve, first of all, resignation of present members of the opposition who, for one reason or another, may feel themselves unable to continue to serve as effectively as they would wish. The procedure would also guarantee replacement by Progressive Conservative senators to be selected from a list of potential appointees provided by the opposition.

The opposition may feel that this system seems to guarantee only maintenance of the present opposition strength in the Senate, and is therefore unsatisfactory. Well, honourable senators, at least this is an opportunity for the opposition to re-invigorate their ranks. It is a starting point, a guaranteed minimum, perhaps, with certainly a good possibility of appointments above this minimum. Meanwhile, I can assure honourable senators that I have communicated to the Prime Minister the desire of the opposition to achieve somewhat greater flexibility than is possible under the present formula, and certainly some persuasive arguments have been advanced by the Leader of the Opposition.

While there has been criticism by the Leader of the Opposition of Senate appointments by the Prime Minister, one needs only to recall the period between 1957 and 1963, when the party which the opposition leader represents had the responsibilities of government. While admittedly opposition ranks in the Senate had been reduced to a small number by the time the new government assumed power in 1957, unlike the present Prime Minister who has appointed some distinguished senators from opposition ranks to this chamber, the Prime Minister of that day showed no inclination whatsoever to appoint any senators outside of his party ranks—or opposition party members to any position.

Senator Walker: You would not expect him to, surely. We were down to five, at that time, and by the time we got through we were—

Senator Flynn: Thirty-four to 60-odd.

Senator Perrault: But, honourable senators, I did state in my speech—and I might just remind you of it again—that I admitted that opposition ranks in the Senate had been reduced to a small number. I understand the condition that prevailed then, but I can recall no speeches by the Prime Minister of that day in which he stated—

● (2110)

Senator Flynn: He did not have to.

Senator Perrault: —he believed that there should be a balance from not only the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party, but other parties in this country as well.

At this time in our history I think we all agree that the Senate can play an increasingly important role, not only in its traditional role as a legislative body of second thought but also as a body well equipped to study in a dispassionate and non-partisan way many of the problems which afflict this nation, a body to protect provincial or minority rights, a body which can undertake investigations of many, many matters, just as we are doing at the present time. To perform effectively the tasks with which the Senate will be vested will require the appointment of many men and women to our ranks in the years to come—men and women, I suggest, from all parties, and some who may have no formal party affiliation whatsoever. The ability to serve and the dedication to Canada and to our parliamentary institutions are not exclusive to any one party, group or region.

The Prime Minister wrote to the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party on March 18, 1977. This letter is not personal and confidential, and excerpts from it have been presented to this house by the Leader of the Opposition. But may I remind honourable senators of some of its contents. To Mr. Clark the Prime Minister said:

You will note that in the speech [page 44], I indicated my willingness to appoint Progressive Conservatives to the Senate to replace Progressive Conservatives who voluntarily retire from the Upper Chamber. The offer applies to voluntary retirement, that is retirement before it is forced by the mandatory age limit of 75, or by death.

The second requirement for the appointment of Progressive Conservatives to the Senate is that notice be given prior to the actual resignation.

Well, it is obviously impossible to give notice prior to the actual death.

This condition is clearly indicated in the letters exchanged by Senators Perrault and Flynn on this topic, copies of which are attached for your interest.

The above two requirements are the same ones that I had conveyed orally to both Mr. Stanfield, then Leader of the Opposition, and to Mr. Flynn, during the life of the 1968-1972 Parliament, sometime around 1969 or 1970, I think.

I trust this information will be helpful to you.

These are excerpts from the letter of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, who leads the official opposition in the other place. This is an offer from the Prime Minister which I think really requires a response from the Progressive Conservative Party. I know of no lists of names which have been submitted to fill any of the Senate vacancies which the Progressive Conservative Party may feel should be filled with Conservative appointments. I am not saying this in a critical fashion, but I suggest there should now be specific initiatives by the party opposite in terms of names submitted for appointments to Senate vacancies which honourable senators in the opposition may believe are rightfully Progressive Conservative Senate vacancies.

In closing, may I suggest to the Honourable Leader of the Opposition that he meet with his leader and develop a list of suggested names for those Senate vacancies where, in their view, a valid case exists for Progressive Conservative appointments. As well, may I suggest to the honourable leader that he review the ranks of his present supporters, and canvass opinions as to whether there are some senators who may wish to exercise the option of taking retirement now and thereby be assured that Progressive Conservative replacements will be made.

Senator Flynn: Senator Greene suggested that I should consider my own case first.

Senator Langlois: That is not a bad idea.

Senator Perrault: Senator Greene is a very original and inventive thinker. He also has great faith in human nature.

While I can offer no personal guarantees and promises with regard to the matter of appointments, because this is the prerogative of the Prime Minister, I can assure you that the Prime Minister and his supporters in this chamber are mindful of the need to have Parliament operate as effectively as possible, and this, without any question, requires a strengthening of the opposition here. But again I urge the Leader of the Opposition to undertake initiatives to discuss the matter thoroughly with his own supporters here, to review the list of senators who may wish to retire—to review the list of Progressive Conservative senators who have retired or passed on in recent months and years—and draw up a list of names. I want to assure the honourable leader that I am prepared to work very closely with him. Certainly, I will support any valid claims for opposition replacements.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Senator Blois retired in the full belief that all conditions necessary for carrying out the program of appointing Conservatives to replace Conservatives had been met. May I ask what condition exists that prevents the appointment of a Conservative to replace Senator Blois?

Senator Perrault: I want to inform the house that I have taken to the Prime Minister the arguments that have been presented to me by the opposition with respect to the retirement of Senator Blois and others. At the same time, may I suggest again that there is an initiative clearly required by the opposition to submit a list of five names for any proposed replacement of that kind. Let us take it from there. I do not want to mention specific names of senators here because I think it would be unfair, but I have talked to certain senators asking them for suggested opposition Senate appointments which I could take to the Prime Minister. I regret to say that I have not had very much of a response.

Senator Smith (Colchester): May I persist a little further to see if I can ascertain what the exact reason that have been appointment is. Is it because a sufficient list of names has not been submitted from which that replacement may be selected?

Senator Perrault: A list of names would be a good starting point. However, I would not purport to speak on behalf of the Prime Minister and endeavour to give you any or all of the reasons why there may have been a delay or a difference of opinion with respect to this replacement.

Senator Smith (Colchester): With respect, may I ask the leader if he is not prepared to be frank in this particular instance and agree that it might be very difficult for those who are interested in the kind of replacement we have been talking about to know what to do?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the honourable senator himself is a living example of the generosity of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister with respect to appointments, and may I say that I think the senator has been an excellent appointment to this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the Leader of the Government for his kindly reference to myself. I have some other explanations as to how I got here, which perhaps he would not consider so satisfactory. In any event, to display the excellence which he alleged that I have exhibited, I would pursue him a little further to tell us if there is another reason for the fact that a replacement of the appropriate political affiliation has not been made to succeed Senator Blois, who certainly resigned when he did not have to, and in my belief—and I think I have the very best grounds for that belief—he resigned in the full faith that he would be so replaced and replaced promptly.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, since Confederation appointments to the Senate have been shrouded in a certain degree of mystery and enigma, and there are many supporters of all parties who may not understand the process completely. Certainly, there are even said to be supporters of the government who ask themselves why certain Liberals were not appointed.

Senator Flynn: Or why they were appointed.

Senator Perrault: This “mystery,” if, as the honourable senator suggests, a “mystery” exists, is not confined to the Progressive Conservative Party. However, I cannot give information beyond that which I have offered this evening.

Senator Smith (Colchester): At the risk of making the Leader of the Government revise his opinion of my usefulness here, I do have to persist in saying that, so far as I am aware, he has not yet given any reason in answer to my question. I asked what conditions had not been met as a result of which the kind of appointment we are talking about had not been made. If the Leader of the Government relies upon his undoubted right not to answer questions, then I accept that, and that will be the end of it. However, so long as he does not rely on his right not to answer questions, and since he himself raised the point of complying with conditions, I think it would only be fair and reasonable for him to say what conditions have not been met.

Senator Perrault: It is impossible to discuss the specifics of certain vacancies and appointments in this particular setting. If the honourable senator would care to discuss the matter of appointments with me in my office, I would be prepared to do so, or perhaps we could have an exchange of correspondence. I think those routes could be pursued more usefully. I have given all of the information that I am able to give this evening on the question of opposition appointments, and I do not really think—as I have said—that it is of much advantage to discuss in this chamber specific vacancies that may exist at this time.

Senator Asselin: It is the kind of mystery you are talking about.

Senator Langlois: You should talk.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I only—

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senator, if I may, I think I was on my feet first. Being on the government side, and without any heckling from the opposition, perhaps I might ask the Leader of the Government—

Senator Smith (Colchester): You have not been here long enough to attract heckling.

Senator Grosart: Senator Smith has the floor.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I only want to say to the Leader of the Government that I, subject, of course, to the approval of my leader and my colleagues, will be glad to accept his invitation to repeat my request for information in the manner he has indicated.

Senator Ewasew: Honourable senators, I think this issue—and I trust I have some more support on the government side—is far more fundamental than is evident to us. The tenure of a senator should never be subject to any partisan condition whatever. I do not endorse a condition that requires resignation for the appointment of further senators to the opposition. As I recall reading Senator Flynn's speech of May 3, he said there are something like 75 Liberals and 15 Progressive Conservatives. If such is the case, there is no rhyme or reason why the government should adopt a policy that any further increase in the opposition be conditional on the resignation of the already small number of existing opposition senators. I want to go on record as saying that I wholeheartedly refuse to endorse such a policy. I believe it is contrary to the constitutional set-up of the Senate. The tenure of a senator should never, in any instance, be subject to that form of pressure, partisan or otherwise.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I feel compelled to intervene briefly in this debate, first of all to say that I do not think it is very relevant for the Leader of the Government to say that when the Conservative Party came into office in 1957 the then Prime Minister did not make any effort to appoint Liberal senators, and did not express any philosophic convictions on the desirability of appointing senators from both major political parties, or indeed from other parties.

After all, if I recall correctly, the Conservative Party in the Senate at that time had been reduced to a very small number indeed. I cannot remember how many; Senator Asselin confirms my impression that it was five, and there was a very large Liberal majority in the Senate. In those circumstances, it seems to me that the situation was very different then from what it is when you have an enormous Liberal majority in the Senate and a mere corporal's guard of Conservative senators. I do not wish in any way to depreciate the value of the Conservative senators in this house, for whom I have great respect, as I think they are aware, but the fact remains that there are very few of them.

The circumstances that confront the present Prime Minister and the present government are very different from the circumstances that confronted Mr. Diefenbaker in 1957, and I think it is wholly unreasonable to suggest that because Mr. Diefenbaker did not take the plunge and appoint a lot of Liberal senators—which would, of course, have meant increasing the majority against his government—it is very improper, unfair and unsuitable to suggest that the present government should behave in the same way under totally different circumstances.

I must express also my strong disappointment that all the substance we seem to have got tonight from the Leader of the Government on this subject is that, subject to certain conditions, into which I do not propose to enter, the government is prepared to see that the Conservative Party in this house does not suffer any further diminution. Frankly, I don't really think that is quite good enough, because it seems to me that, even if the Conservative senators are of the high quality that they are, and even if they work as hard as they undoubtedly do, at any rate those of them who are not prevented by ill health from time to time, it seems to me they are dreadfully handicapped by being so few. True, in our committees partisan lines are not very strongly drawn, and that is, of course, right and desirable. On the other hand, it does seem to me desirable that there should be some nearer approach to some kind of balance, both in the house itself and in the committees, than is made possible by the extraordinary fewness of Conservative senators at this time.

I want to express my great disappointment that we did not get something more substantial tonight in the way of a reply from the Leader of the Government to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition earlier in the session. I want also to say that, not only does this seem to me very unsatisfactory, but the attempt to bolster it by attacking a previous government, or reflecting on a previous government, for not behaving very differently in totally different circumstances seems to me a very weak argument.

I don't suppose I shall improve my standing with the members of the government party by what I have said tonight. But I can bear with a certain degree of equanimity the reproaches which may be addressed to me, because I think it is important for the proper functioning of the Senate that some of these things should be said, and should be said by somebody who cannot be accused of being merely a Conservative Party hack.

Senator Perrault: I am rather disappointed in the statement made by the Honourable Senator Forsey. I had expected something more constructive.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, I am on my feet now.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order.

Senator Perrault: I suggest that you don't have a valid point of order.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order.

Senator Perrault: What is your point of order?

Senator Flynn: On a point of order. A senator cannot speak twice on a question.

Senator Perrault: I am not speaking twice on a question.

Senator Flynn: If Senator Perrault speaks now he will be speaking for the second time. Unless he says that he has been misquoted he cannot intervene at this time. If he does, I don't mind. If the Senate approves I am willing for him to do that, but anyone will be entitled to do the same thing.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator should know more about procedure in this chamber than to make specious observations of that kind.

Senator Flynn: It is not a specious observation. It is a point of order.

Senator Perrault: It is not a point of order.

Senator Flynn: It is.

Senator Perrault: I have a right—

Senator Flynn: I will ask Madam Speaker to rule on it.

Senator Perrault: I have a right to explain portions of my speech which were obviously badly misconstrued.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: I think I have the support of honourable senators when I seek the opportunity to clarify certain portions of my speech.

Honourable senators, at no time was a suggestion made that there was an arbitrary lid being imposed on Progressive Conservative appointments to this chamber. Indeed, I suggested very clearly, I think, that in effect the Prime Minister had established an opposition "minimum"—a very welcome development as far as democracy in this chamber is concerned. I did not rule out the possibility of appointments above that minimum.

Secondly, I want to tell honourable senators that over recent weeks and months concerted efforts have been made to find certain suitable candidates for appointment from the Progressive Conservative Party—consideration has been given to certain notable figures, who I hope ultimately may be persuaded to accept appointments.

Thirdly, I carefully delineated in my speech that in 1957 conditions were substantially different from those at the present time. Honourable senator, I said it not only once but twice, and I would have thought the honourable senator might have understood the meaning of my remarks after that kind of repetition.

Senator Ewasew: May I direct this to the leader of the house?

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Senator Flynn: Since the debate has been going on this way I don't know why Senator Ewasew should not be entitled to speak now.

● (2130)

Senator Ewasew: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. I don't think you are misconstrued, but I might have misunderstood you. I should like to have a possible misunderstanding cleared up, and that is: Did you state that there can be no further appointments to the opposition side, from the Conservative Party, unless there are prior resignations? I think this is really the issue that prompted, and quite rightly so, Senator Forsey to take the position he just did.

However, Senator Perrault, I think we all understood you to say that additional appointments to the opposition side of the Senate were conditional providing there were further resignations. Did I understand you correctly? Is that the minimum to which you referred? If not, what do you mean by "the minimum"? Are there to be conditions of resignation attached to further appointments applicable only to the opposition side in the Senate? If so, I think it is totally unacceptable. Not only is it unacceptable, but it strikes at the very core of the independence of a senator from partisan politics individually, and, in the long term, collectively for the very existence of the Senate itself.

Senator Perrault: May I suggest that it may be appropriate for honourable senators to study the record of tonight's proceedings, and tomorrow they may wish to resume a line of questioning during question period on what I may or may not have said. Honourable senators, I do not think it would be constructive to go through my entire speech again, which I thought was fair and reasonably conciliatory.

Senator Flynn: I hope the honourable leader will do the same and read the remarks of the others and not become excited with respect to any criticism.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I rise on a point of order to draw the attention of the house to rule 37, which reads as follows:

A senator called to order by the Speaker shall discontinue his remarks and may not speak further, except on the point of order, until the point of order has been decided.

I am not suggesting for a moment that Her Honour has an opportunity to rule on the point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition, but I do suggest that the rule clearly indicates that once the point of order has been raised the person in respect of whom it has been raised ought properly to give the Speaker an opportunity to make a ruling, and, in the sense of the rule which I just read, discontinue until the Speaker has done so. In that regard, it is my opinion that the comments of the Leader of the Opposition with regard to the point of order were well taken.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I read you rule 28, from page 7:

A senator shall not speak more than once to a question before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of his speech in which he may have been misunderstood, and then he shall not introduce new matter.

I believe that I stood on grounds which are fully justified and supported by the rules of the Senate of Canada.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I just wish to point out that we are well aware of the rule which the leader just read; indeed, that is the very rule to which the Leader of the Opposition referred. The point of order I am raising is that once that point had been raised by the Leader of the Opposition the appropriate and orderly thing to have done was to have given the Speaker an opportunity to rule on the point before any further effort was made to continue the remarks which called forth the point of order. That is all I am saying. I cannot insist that I am right, naturally, but I insist that what I say will be borne out by even the most careful and minute examination of the parliamentary rules, not only Beauchesne, but the rules of the House of Commons in England.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not know how they conduct the affairs of the Legislature of Nova Scotia, but in this particular assembly we have a right to reply to points of order which may be made, valid or otherwise.

Senator Smith (Colchester): You have a right to reply according to the rules and all the way. One thing of which I can inform the honourable gentleman about the conduct of business in the Legislature of Nova Scotia is that it is done according to order.

Senator Flynn: Who is calling order?

Senator Smith (Colchester): You see how easy it is when a senator does not pay any attention to the rules to have us all wander afield and consume a good deal of energy and effort which might be avoided by careful attention to the rules in the first place.

Having delivered myself of those great words of wisdom, I now move the adjournment of this debate.

Senator Grosart: If I may, before the adjournment, because I did rise while the point of order was being discussed: It was merely to remind the Leader of the Government that when the Leader of the Opposition rose on the point of order, Senator Perrault's immediate statement was: "That is not a point of order," which he repeated at least twice and I trust the record will show that. I would merely remind him that that is a decision of the Speaker and not a decision to be made by the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Senators: Question on the adjournment.

Senator Perrault: It is on your motion to adjourn.

On motion of Senator Smith (Colchester), debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: Before I move adjournment I wish to inform honourable senators that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet in camera in room 263-S at 9.30 tomorrow morning to consider the subject matter of Bill C-16, the Borrowers and Depositors Protection Act. The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet in room 356-S at 9.30 tomorrow morning and at 2.30 tomorrow afternoon to consider Bill C-41, the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act and other Acts in consequence thereof. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet in room 256-S at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning to consider Bill C-25, the Canadian Human Rights Act. There will be witnesses from the Department of Justice. In the afternoon there will be a meeting in room 263-S at 2.30, at which will appear the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet in camera in room 256-S tomorrow afternoon. The Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet in room 269 in the West Block at 2.30 tomorrow afternoon.

So honourable senators will look forward to a very busy day again tomorrow. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Before the question is put, may I just draw attention to the fact that the Leader of the Government in enumerating the committees which are to meet tomorrow morning has drawn the attention of the Senate to the immediacy of the debate with reference to membership and appointments to the Senate. What he said indicates that some senators on this side of the house are supposed to be in three places at the same time tomorrow morning. Although those of us in the opposition have developed a great facility for being in two places at once, this addition of a third place at the same time may create some trouble.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 28, 1977

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-5, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-18, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—COMMONS AMENDMENTS—CONSIDERATION NEXT SITTING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-3, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill with the following amendments to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

Clause 3

1. Page 3: Strike out lines 32 to 36 inclusive, on page 3, and substitute the following therefor:

"Act, a company may, if its subscribed stock is fully paid, by a by-law made by the directors and confirmed by at least two-thirds of the votes cast by the shareholders and a majority of the total votes cast at a special general meeting duly called for considering the by-law, divide the portion of its capital stock represented by any existing class of shares into shares of larger or smaller par value.

(2.2) Where under this section any portion of the capital stock of a company is divided into shares having a par value of less than five dollars, such shares shall not entitle the holder thereof to a number of votes exceeding the quotient obtained by dividing the total par value of all such shares held by him by five.

(3) A by-law made under this section"

2. Page 4: Add immediately after subclause 4(1), on page 4, the following subclause:

"(1.1) Subparagraph 63(1)(h)(ii) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(ii) the plant or equipment of a corporation or partnership that is used in the transaction of the business of that corporation or partnership; or"

3. Pages 4 and 5: Strike out lines 25 to 52 inclusive, on page 4, and lines 1 to 5 inclusive, on page 5, and substitute the following therefor:

"(A) the amount of the total indebtedness of the corporation on the date of the investment, and

(B) where the investment is to be made in a new issue of bonds, debentures or other evidences of indebtedness of the corporation, the amount of additional indebtedness to be incurred by the corporation as the result of that issue, does not exceed three times the aggregate of the average amounts of paid-in capital, contributed surplus, retained earnings and total indebtedness of the corporation, each such average amount being calculated as one-fifth of the aggregate of the relevant amounts determined as at the end of each of the five financial years of the corporation immediately preceding the date of investment, and for the purposes of this subparagraph,

(C) where the corporation at the date of a proposed investment owns beneficially, directly or indirectly, more than fifty per cent of the common shares of one or more other corporations and the amounts of the corporation and those other corporations are normally presented to the shareholders of the corporation in consolidated form, the amount of paid-in capital, contributed surplus, retained earnings and total indebtedness at any relevant time may be determined on the basis of a consolidation of the accounts of the corporation and those other corporations, and

(D) where the corporation is a corporation continuing or formed as a result of the amalgamation or merger of two or more corporations, the amount of paid-in capital, contributed surplus, retained earnings and total indebtedness at any relevant time prior to the amalgamation or merger shall be deemed to be identical with the corresponding amounts determined on the basis of a consolidation of the accounts of the amalgamated or merged corporations,”

4. Page 5: Strike out line 45, on page 5, and substitute the following therefor:

“(B.1) where the corporation is a corporation continuing or formed as a result of the amalgamation or merger of two or more corporations, it is deemed to have had earnings and annual interest requirements for any relevant period prior to the date of the amalgamation or merger, identical with the earnings and annual interest requirements of the amalgamated or merged corporations determined on the basis of a consolidation of their accounts, and”

5. Page 6: Strike out lines 10 to 19 inclusive, on page 6, and substitute the following therefor:

“five years that ended less than one year before the date of investment, the corporation

(i) paid in each of at least four of the five years, including the last year of that period, a dividend upon its common shares, or

(ii) earned in each of at least four of the five years, including the last year of that period, an amount available for the payment of a dividend upon its common shares,”

Clause 8

6. Page 11: Strike out line 31, on page 11, and substitute the following therefor:

“(2) Subsections 71(3) to (7) of the said”

7. Page 19: Strike out line 39, on page 19, and substitute the following therefor:

“ter, exceed the total liabilities of the company in that country including the amount of the reserves on”

Clause 16

8. Page 22: Strike out lines 3 to 8 inclusive, on page 22, and substitute the following therefor:

“a rate or rates of interest and a rate or rates of mortality, accident, sickness or other contingencies

(a) that, in the opinion of the valuation actuary, are appropriate to the circumstances of the company and the policies and claims being valued; and

(b) that are acceptable to the Superintendent.”

New Clause 20.1

9. Page 31: Add immediately after clause 20, on page 31, the following new clause:

“20.1 The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 129 thereof, the following section:

“129.1 (1) Notwithstanding sections 57, 123 and 129, for the purposes of this Act, a British company shall not, except with the concurrence of the Minister and subject to such conditions as he may impose, deposit with the Receiver General or vest in trust

(a) bonds, debentures or other evidences of indebtedness that are payable only in a currency other than that of Canada; or

(b) shares that are redeemable or the dividends on which are payable only in a currency other than that of Canada.

(2) Where under subsection (1) the Minister concurs in a deposit or vesting in trust of bonds, debentures, other evidences of indebtedness or shares, he may determine the value at which the bonds, debentures, other evidences of indebtedness or shares so deposited or vested in trust shall be accepted, for the purposes of this Act.”

Clause 24

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I move that these amendments be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION (SCIENTIFIC ACTIVITIES) BILL, 1976

CONCURRENCE BY COMMONS IN SENATE AMENDMENT

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that they have agreed to the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-26, respecting the organization of certain scientific activities of the Government of Canada, without any amendment.

THE SENATE CHAMBER

MALFUNCTION OF AIR CONDITIONING SYSTEM

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that there is a story around—probably apocryphal—that a former Prime Minister who served a record-shattering number of years in that office ordered each year that the fans and cooling systems be shut off in the buildings during June and July in order to expedite the work of Parliament before the summer recess.

I want to assure honourable senators that this was not done on this occasion; that the air conditioner has broken down and the technicians are now at work in an effort to restore the service; and that this is not psychological warfare by the government in order to bring about heat exhaustion.

● (2010)

Senator Grosart: Has it broken down in the House of Commons?

Senator Perrault: I understand it has broken down there as well, yes.

BANKING LEGISLATION

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE
TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I desire to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce relating to the document entitled: "White Paper on the Revision of Canadian Banking Legislation, August, 1976", tabled in the Senate on Thursday, 21st October, 1976.

I ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day, and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix to today's Hansard.)

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave, I propose to explain some of the highlights of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, your committee spent quite some time in studying the contents of the White Paper on Canadian Banking Legislation. We heard many witnesses and read many briefs, and did a great deal in the way of research. The work was not easy, but it is completed. I should like to indicate some of the highlights of the report, and the reasons therefor. In doing so, I shall bear in mind the fact that I face some competition this evening. It is supposed to be the essence of trade competition, according to what I read in the competition legislation, but the kind of competition this evening, where I am running in opposition to an unworkable air-conditioning system, makes it difficult for me to project as much as I should like in connection with this report, and for you to listen to me.

If I may enumerate what I regard as the highlights, they are as follows: first, the white paper provides for the creation of an association to be known as the Canadian Payments Association. It is intended to be companion legislation to the revised Bank Act, representing the decennial revision of Canadian banking legislation.

The second subject matter I should like to discuss briefly has to do with chartered banks' reserves under the provisions of the white paper, and also the extent to which your committee recommends changes. I should like also to discuss briefly the position proposed with reference to foreign banks, and the establishment of foreign bank subsidiaries in Canada as outlined in the White Paper on Canadian Banking Legislation, as well as the recommendations which we make, which may be said to be at variance in some particulars with what is contained in the white paper.

I should like also very briefly—and I mean very briefly—to discuss the creation of new banks in Canada under the revised Bank Act and the right which it is proposed to give to provincial governments to hold, own and vote shares in such Canadian banks.

There are many other things in the report. There is a great deal in connection with the extension of business powers and practices in the field of banking—in many cases adding additional powers, subject to certain restraints, to those now exercised by Canadian banks. Those banks, you must remember, will include the foreign banks' subsidiaries that may be incorporated in Canada following the enactment of the new Bank Act.

Touching first on the Canadian Payments Association, it will be made up of members from all the chartered banks and near-banks. The language of the white paper is that members will be banks and near-banks which make loans and accept deposits transferable on order. Another phrase we might use for that is "chequable deposits." The scheme is that the Canadian Payments Association will constitute the clearing house or the clearing system for the combination of chartered banks and near-banks.

In this connection I should first point out to you what the white paper says, then the recommendations we make. The near-banks, including the trust companies, the mortgage companies, the caisses populaires and the credit unions all appeared before our committee. They were quite happy to see being created a payments association that would be the clearing house, or represent the clearing system, for all chequable deposits. Heretofore the Canadian Bankers Association did all the clearing. They incorporated an association in about 1903 which acted as the clearing house. By agreement with the Bank of Canada at a later date, the cash reserves and the secondary reserves required under the Bank Act to be provided by the banks since 1967 were deposited with the Bank of Canada. The Bank of Canada was the depository.

In the white paper the scheme proposed in connection with reserves would, in effect, subject near-banks that I have named to the provision of the same reserves based on a percentage of their demand deposits and their notice deposits at certain specific rates which were set up. When they made their position clear, it appeared to us and to our advisers that the net result was that this involved the provision of cash reserves in a very substantial amount. The near-banks felt that they had to qualify their position in reference to the Canadian Payments Association. They wish to be a member and they wish to enjoy the prestige and the privilege of being able to do their own clearing, since they have grown substantially in size and importance, but they complained bitterly about having to lay out so much of their accumulated deposits in cash reserves to the Bank of Canada, and they felt the justification mentioned in the white paper was not sufficient to support any such imposition. The white paper said that these reserves from the near-banks were needed as part of the exercise of the control of monetary policy.

We have examined this subject matter very carefully, and we have had the benefit of considering what I would call statements made by a number of persons who could be regarded as expert witnesses. One statement was by the present Governor of the Bank of Canada. He said that the control of monetary policy by the Bank of Canada is one of the subject matters with which it is directed by statute to concern itself. He said it is working well through the present cash reserve system provided by the chartered banks, and that the near-banks contribute indirectly to the working of that policy, because when the Bank of Canada sells or buys securities it affects the market up or down, and that is the way in which it secures a measure of control. This reacts indirectly on the near-banks, because in one situation the cost of money goes up and people may withdraw their savings to seek in other areas higher interest yields, while, in another direction, there is the opposite effect.

So the essence of having the near-banks join a clearing system appeared to us to be that there should be what we call "clearing settlement cash reserves." Then in the draw-downs that take place each day at clearing time, when the cheques are being cleared, if there is an excess in one direction the cash reserve may be down. We thought that situation should be protected and we recommended that there should also be what we called an "overdraft security reserve." That overdraft security reserve would consist of interest-bearing securities, government bonds and cash. The near-banks, of course, would not complain, because their great complaint has been over the question of cash reserve and the fact that that money does not earn any income for them.

So we would set up those two reserves, and they must be provided by the chartered banks and by the near-banks. But under the system which is proposed for the Canadian Payments Association there may be clearing members who have to provide their reserves and pay them to the association. We expect that there will be an agreement between the Canadian Payments Association and the Bank of Canada under which the cash reserves will be paid over to the Bank of Canada, and the Bank of Canada will manage, administer and invest the moneys.

The reason we have taken the course of having payments made in the first instance to the Canadian Payments Association, and then being transferred by the association to the Bank of Canada, is twofold. First of all, the Bank of Canada has acquired great experience in doing this kind of job, and I understand that regional offices of the Bank of Canada are used in connection with the daily clearings which go on at the present time. The way the near-banks clear at the present time is through an arrangement with a chartered bank under which they provide the chartered bank with certain cash reserves, and then if the bank requires additional security they provide additional security. The chartered bank does the clearing for the near-banks who are not, and who up to now have not been able to be, members of the clearing association. Only the chartered banks are members of the clearing association.

Secondly, there may be a group which does not desire to be directly a clearing member of the association. It may be of such small size, and have such a small dollar volume of business, that its becoming a clearing member and assuming the burden of the charges and the provision of reserves could not be justified. So, another category is provided in the white paper, to be known as non-clearing members. They have to provide the clearing member with the cash reserves required under the white paper proposal. Then the clearing member has to provide to the Bank of Canada the amount of such clearing cash reserve which is necessary by reason of their taking on this job of clearing for a non-clearing member. That is the essence of the situation.

We decided that all they need is a clearing settlement reserve, a cash reserve bolstered or supported by an overdraft security reserve to take care of the position of the ups and downs daily in clearing balances. As a result of that, we came to a conclusion—after gathering and compiling a great many figures and having them checked, double checked and again re-checked—as to what might be said to be adequate in the way of furnishing cash reserves. We concluded and we recommend that the clearing settlement cash reserve should be a minimum of 1 per cent on the chequable deposits, or the deposits transferable by order, or a maximum of 3 per cent.

We did have information which indicated that the chartered banks operate on a basis of approximately 3 per cent. The manner in which the 1 per cent and 3 per cent would work would be that there could not be a cash reserve provided of less than 1 per cent of the chequable deposits. The daily average of clearing and clearing balances by the near-banks and banks over the period of the year 1976 is taken. Then a factor would be added to reflect anticipated growth, and on that basis a figure is reached which, when one per cent is applied, would be within the range of 1 per cent to 3 per cent, but a cash reserve of more than 3 per cent cannot be required.

If there is any overdrawn position, of course, the overdraft security reserve and the securities therein can be used by the Bank of Canada for the purpose of financing that overdraft for that day. So the real difference between the system proposed in the white paper and the system which we propose, if it were reflected in dollars, can be found at Appendix A of the report.

There we have calculated under the white paper proposal what the eligible deposits are for the chartered banks, the trust and mortgage loan companies, the credit unions, the caisses populaires and the Quebec savings banks. We have also calculated what the cash reserve requirements are under the white paper. Then we have figured out, in the outside column, what the clearing settlement cash reserve would be. You can see, for instance, that so far as the chartered banks were concerned, their cash reserve requirements would amount to about $4.4 billion under the white paper proposals. Under the clearing settlement cash reserve system, on a maximum basis, they would be $480 million. The caisses populaires, which under the white paper would be called on to pay $120 million in the way of cash reserves, even at the maximum of 3 per cent under the clearing settlement cash reserve proposed in this report, would pay $75 million. The representatives of the trust companies and other near-banks whose representatives appeared before your committee said that they would be perfectly satisfied to provide cash reserves on the basis of their chequable deposits, another description of which is, "deposits transferable by order," which, together with the clearing of them, is a real banking function. We have recommended that the primary cash reserves and secondary reserves remain in the Bank Act.

● (2030)

You can see that what we were aiming at was to solve these problems as far as the near-banks were concerned, and the caisses populaires and credit unions—particularly the caisses populaires—represented that there was inherent in this a problem as far as they were concerned with regard to making payments directly to the Bank of Canada in the circumstances which exist now. In the course of their examination I did ask one of the witnesses, "Well, would you have any objection if you paid a cash reserve to the Payments Association, and the Payments Association paid it to the Bank of Canada?" and the answer was, "No".

It is a simple way out of this problem. It puts the picture, as far as the near-banks are concerned, where, in the opinion of your committee, it should be—that is, that they require clearing, and they figure that anything they must provide by way of cash reserves in order to be a member of the clearing association is something they must accept. But, in the circumstances, as far as their having to make cash reserve contributions for monetary policy is concerned, when the present Governor of the Bank of Canada says that that is not needed at this time, when we read the evidence of the former Governor, Mr. Rasminsky, to the Porter Commission to the same effect, and when we read an extract from the statement of the Economic Council saying the same thing, we felt we were among the people who had the ability and experience to think clearly and thoroughly about what the picture should be. We have therefore recommended this system of reserves, limiting only the amount of the cash clearing reserves and the overdraft security reserve.

I took a little longer with that than I expected, but let me now pass on to the bank reserves, which I will try to shorten a little bit.

Since 1967, the banks have been required to pay primary cash reserves to the Bank of Canada under the Bank Act, and the Bank of Canada, under its act, is authorized to accept these deposits. The section dealing with this matter further says that if the Bank of Canada is authorized to pay interest on these cash reserves, it may pay interest. Unfortunately, the Bank Act does not authorize the Bank of Canada to pay interest on these cash reserves. Therefore, the chartered banks were complaining because so much of their money was taken up in cash reserves which produced no income. But, when we looked at the operations of the Bank of Canada, we found that it was investing these cash reserves and taking the income into its operations and earnings. In 1975 its net earnings, not only from the handling of these cash reserves but from the other business it did, amounted to about $583 million. In 1976 this had increased to $703 million. That, according to the best calculations we could make, would mean that 30 per cent of that net income was earned on the cash reserves put up by the chartered banks. The chartered banks were saying to us, "We are entitled to receive income and earnings from that money."

We studied the situation in the United States and in England, and we concluded there was some legitimate basis for this complaint, and we recommended that interest should be paid. This would involve an amendment to the Bank Act to authorize the payment of interest, in which event the Bank of Canada would have to pay the interest. Otherwise, as the Economic Council said, this looks like an income tax or some other kind of tax. It is in fact a levy. If you put up cash, the person you put it up with earns income and then pays the income over to the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, and that has all the earmarks of being a levy or a tax. So we have recommended that some part of the interest earnings should be paid to the banks who provide the money.

I should tell you one element that I omitted in connection with the Payments Association. We have recommended that the contributions and cash reserves by the chartered banks to the Payments Association and the Bank of Canada should be offset against the cash reserves which the chartered banks already have with the Bank of Canada. And because the chartered banks have something of the order of $4.5 billion in primary reserves, cash reserves, with the Bank of Canada, and another almost equal amount in interest-bearing securities by way of secondary reserves with the Bank of Canada, we felt there was ample elbow room in the cash which the Bank of Canada already has, and had received from the chartered banks, that an offset or a credit should be given for the payment of the cash reserves for clearing settlement, and we have so provided and recommended.

Now there are a number of other things in connection with chartered banks that we have dealt with. I should tell you very briefly that there was a limitation in the Bank Act under which banks could invest up to 10 per cent of their deposit liabilities and debentures in residential mortgages. The white paper proposes that that ceiling be removed, and that such investment be unlimited. Instead of that, we have recommended that the 10 per cent ceiling should be increased to 15 per cent, because we feel there should be some limitation in the interest of liquidity providing some ceiling in respect of investment in residential mortgages.

Then there are many other items in connection with the chartered banks' reserves. However, time is moving along, and the only thing I can tell you is that, in connection with financial leasing and factoring, which of recent years has been entered into indirectly by the banks, the white paper proposes that the banks be given the authority directly to invest in financial leasing and in factoring. We have approved of that in our recommendations, but we have recommended that they should be able to do that either through the bank itself or through a subsidiary company incorporated for that purpose, because we conceive of difficulties in carrying out leasing transactions, security, paper work and so on, which might add difficulties if the bank were doing it directly. We have, therefore, approved of what the white paper says, but we have recommended that there is the option that the bank may do it itself or may do it through a subsidiary corporation.

I ignore many of the other beneficial effects in our recommendations. Honourable senators can read our recommendations in the summary on the first seven or eight pages.

The next thing is foreign banks, which presented some problems. The white paper proposes that foreign banks who wish to operate in Canada must incorporate a subsidiary company, and that subsidiary company has certain limitations. It may initially have authorized capital of $5 million, and there must be $2.5 million paid up. It may increase that, with the permission of the Minister of Finance and the Governor in Council, to $25 million, which would mean that the total assets they might hold would be twenty times $25 million or any part of $25 million which the capital reaches, and the top limit on their total assets would be $500 million.

The white paper also proposes that they have a limit of 15 per cent on their total commercial lending in Canada. We had a number of bankers before us. We had three or four bank firms from London, England, we had Citicorp, an American institution operating in a big way in Canada. They have certain problems. One of the problems is, first, that they want to incorporate a subsidiary in Canada. Whatever they have to do to get into Canada, they want to do it, but there are certain difficulties in the way. The white paper says that if a foreign bank which wishes to incorporate a subsidiary in Canada is carrying on business through other financial institutions that it owns or controls, then those operations that they have can be merged into the banking operation, like leasing and factoring. That is perfectly all right, but if there are non-banking transactions they cannot operate through such non-banking affiliates, and these banks have real difficulties in that regard. While they have some affiliates or financial institutions that are operating in Canada and can be merged with the foreign bank subsidiary that they incorporate, there are others that are carrying on non-banking operations.

We have, therefore, made several recommendations. We say that the 15 per cent limitation on total commercial lending should be indexed, and it should be subject to increase depending on the average of the growth of the Canadian chartered banks in the previous year. We have recommended that indexing. We have also recommended that if a foreign bank has reached its limit, or has a limit of 15 per cent of commercial lending in Canada, then that is its limit. We have recommended that if at June 30, 1977, the foreign bank in Canada is up to the 15 per cent or has exceeded the 15 per cent, it is frozen at that figure until it gets on side. It could get on side over a period of time by a system of indexing. Otherwise there is a period of time recommended for it to phase out the overage.

The other problem is one that we did not even attempt to resolve, although we do make some suggestions. That is the problem of affiliates, and it is a very serious problem. Wrapped up in that is the operation of consortia and the operations of joint ventures in which international banks carry on business nowadays. The international banks have adopted this course of operation because it limits their liability. If they take a 10 per cent interest in a group of banks, there are many financial operations carried on by international banks in Canada in natural resource development, and even in dealing with governments in Canada. It is the thing and the innovative practice of the moment, and the problem that develops is that of affiliates. If an international bank, a foreign bank, wants to have a subsidiary operation in Canada, the one thing it does not want to do is to carry on any of the consortium operations, or any of its large scale financing, through the subsidiary company, because this would be exposing the entire assets of the subsidiary in that regard.

A reading of the white paper would appear to show that in that kind of situation, unless some way is found to resolve it, they would be debarred from having a subsidiary operation in Canada, and also have this particular type of financing where they can limit their financial contribution to the particular enterprise. We have said, in effect, that the Department of Finance is in a better position than we are—it has more staff—to explore the potential, the possibilities and the seriousness of this.

We have suggested a way in which it might be done. It might be done by making such an operation through a consortium, where you have one bank, which is a consortium bank, and it is the key to the operation of a joint venture by a series of international banks. However, if, under what the white paper says, they attempted to do that, they would appear to be in difficulty. We have said it may be possible to create an exception, but the exception would have to limit the operations of the consortium bank to that one enterprise of financing, and they could not carry on any other banking operations.

We have also asserted the principle that no favours must be granted. No favourable position must be given to the foreign banks that are seeking to operate in Canada which is not at least equally enjoyed by Canadian banks. We have said that that is a paramount consideration, and the position of Canadian banks must remain dominant in the field of the Canadian banking system.

On the question of incorporating banks in the future by letters patent, the white paper recommends incorporation by letters patent. We did point out that one advantage of the present system is that there is a public review, through Parliament, of such applications—as to the people behind the proposed incorporation; as to whether they are the kind of people who should be allowed to venture into the banking system. There should be something that would operate by way of a public review of any application that is made for letters patent and incorporation of a bank. If there is, then we recommend it. We say that it should be of the nature of an ad hoc committee. We do not need to set up a board, a tribunal, or anything of that nature. The ad hoc committee would hold public hearings where the parties, pro and con, can be heard, and where a recommendation could be made to the minister and the minister, in turn, could recommend to the Governor in Council. That is the position we have taken on the letters patent situation.

There are many other items in our report. However, I said that I was going to deal with only the highlights, and the highlights I have dealt with are two in number. There is the Canadian Payments Association, and I believe the solution we offer is a reasonable one and should resolve the problems that would develop.

Then there is the matter of bank reserves. We have proposed and there should be a reduction in the primary cash reserves of the banks. The present cash reserves under the Bank Act are 12 per cent on demand deposits, and 4 per cent on notice deposits. After studying all the figures and examining the bankers and others who appeared before the committee, we have recommended that the 12 per cent and 4 per cent be reduced to 10 per cent and 3 per cent respectively. In one of the appendices at the end of the report we indicate the effect in dollars of doing that. In other words, a substantial amount of money would remain in the hand of the bank, which would be available for its business operations, interest rates, and to meet competition. I believe the amount is slightly less than $1 billion.

At this time, and in view of the conditions under which we are labouring—and I can tell you that I am as close to being soaking wet, because of the humidity, as one could be without actually being soaking wet—I hope I have not exhausted honourable senators by the amount of detail I have given.

There are areas which I have not touched upon, but honourable senators can read them or, in due course, can develop them in discussion. In the meantime, I believe that this is as far as I should take the matter tonight.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know I speak on behalf of all honourable senators when I extend our gratitude and commendations to the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for a very onerous assignment carried out, as usual, efficiently, thoroughly and conscientiously. And certainly all members of the committee deserve the same commendation of us all.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like, on behalf of Senator Forsey, to present the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, as follows:

Tuesday, June 28, 1977.

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Fourth Report as follows:

In accordance with its permanent reference, section 26, The Statutory Instruments Act, 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Committee proposes to continue its review and scrutiny of statutory instruments during the adjournment of Parliament in the summer of 1977.

Your Committee therefore recommends that for this purpose and notwithstanding an Order of the Senate of Wednesday, November 3, 1976, respecting the quorum of the Committee, the Joint Chairman be authorized to hold meetings during the forthcoming summer recess to receive and authorize the printing of evidence when three members of the Committee are present, provided both Houses are represented.

Respectfully submitted,

Eugene A. Forsey,
Joint Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Bonnell moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HELSINKI DECLARATION—CANADIAN DELEGATION AT REVIEW CONFERENCE IN BELGRADE—QUESTION

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I should like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to provide us with the names of the chairman and members of the Canadian delegation representing Canada at the Review Conference on the Helsinki Declaration in Belgrade? Can we expect parliamentarians from both chambers to be chosen to participate actively in the Canadian delegation?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice.

Senator Thompson: I am sure the Leader of the Government is aware that the European Parliamentary Council, which is very interested in the Helsinki Conference, has strongly recommended that there should be parliamentary representation from every country.

Senator van Roggen: As a comment, rather than a question, I understand that the United States Congress is following the same course, which may be something that the Leader of the Government might keep in mind when making his inquiry.

Senator Perrault: I thank honourable senators for drawing the matter to my attention. Inquiries will be made immediately.

CANADA WEEK

PROGRAM ON PARLIAMENT HILL—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the function which took place on Parliament Hill yesterday at about noon, to launch Canada Week, including the selection of the program and speakers, was arranged by a private organization; and, if so, what is the name of that organization, and under whose authority did it operate?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I asked a similar question this morning of representatives of certain government departments. I understand that the body in question was the National Unity Council, a private organization. I understand that the agenda was established by this private organization. I know that some senators may be concerned about the lack of official representation and spokesmen and spokeswoman from some other Canadian parties at that function. It seems to me that it would have been appropriate to have had that kind of all-party representation at the official opening of Canada Week. That is my own personally held opinion. I understand, however, that the government did not set the agenda, and that the event was not the responsibility of any government department.

Senator Smith (Colchester): As a supplementary, could the Leader of the Government tell the house whether the operations of that committee in respect of that function were authorized by any minister or department of government?

● (2100)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, to the best of my understanding, the national unity group in question is made up of Canadians of all parties. Indeed, I understand that Mr. Dalton Camp is one of the very active organizers of Canada Week, as are other members of the party which forms the official opposition in this country.

I have been assured that there was no intervention by any government department. The agenda was arranged by the council itself. I shall be pleased to undertake further inquiries in an attempt to provide a more complete reply for honourable senators.

Senator Walker: Will the government be paying for it? Although this private organization will be doing all the work without any intervention on the part of the government, the bills will go to the government, I expect.

Senator Perrault: To the best of my knowledge, this organization, as is the case with many other organizations at the present time, is actively soliciting money from individuals, private corporations and trade unions, and other organizations from coast to coast. Again, I shall be pleased to undertake an inquiry into that aspect as well. I do know that the government, for its part, will have an active program of Canada Week observances and those programs will involve, at least in part, the expenditures of public funds.

No one political party has a monopoly on the desire to assure the success of Canada Week. National unity is not an issue which should be considered and debated on a partisan basis.

AGRICULTURE

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government a question respecting the speculation about an international wheat agreement being entered into in view of the further deterioration of that market recently and the prospect of other wheat-producing countries being interested in entering into such an agreement.

My specific question is: Are negotiations taking place which could lead to an international wheat agreement being in place before the commencement of the crop year which begins on August 1?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, while I intend to take the question as notice, I can say I understand that there is an active concern with respect to the possibility of establishing such an agreement. Indeed, when I was in Argentina a few weeks ago I undertook to discuss with certain Argentine authorities their views with respect to such an agreement, and the response was very positive. I understand that a similar reaction has been received from certain other wheat-producing countries. As far as the timing of such an agreement, and the possibility of such an agreement being entered into, I shall have to make further inquiries.

NATIONAL UNITY

MEDIA COVERAGE OF SENATOR MOLSON'S ADDRESS IN SENATE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to rise on a matter of privilege. It is not a matter of personal privilege. Rather, it is a matter, I conceive, of Senate privilege.

Last evening Senator Molson spoke in this chamber on the debate on national unity. To my knowledge, as of now that speech has been reported in the Montreal Gazette and over radio station CJAD in Montreal and, undoubtedly, by other forms of the media of which I am unaware. With respect to the reports of Senator Molson's address that were carried in the Montreal Gazette and repeated on Montreal radio station CJAD, the pith of those reports was that Senator Molson will support the Parti Québécois government.

Senator Perrault: Oh heavens!

Senator Lang: If I hear laughter in the house, I can appreciate why. In fairness to both the newspaper and the radio station, I should say that they did add, in smaller print and with lesser voice, that he would do so as long as it provides good government for his province. However, the foremost impression left was that Senator Molson gives his support to the Parti Québécois.

I want to ask honourable senators whether the reporting in question was honest and fair when the context of Senator Molson's remarks included the following, and I quote:

I suggest to you that the most serious situation is that posed by the announced objective of the Quebec government to separate from the rest of the country.

And again I quote:

Thus it is quite clear that if Quebec shatters the country, there will be no possibility of accommodation in currency, trade or other economic matters.

Honourable senators, if by implication the media of Canada could impute separatist motives to Senator Molson, then I can conceive of almost unlimited opportunity for distortion in reporting events in Parliament. I can only assume that some members of the media today are either fools or knaves.

At some later date I intend to initiate an inquiry into which of those alternatives is the case. I hope at that time I might enlist the support of my colleagues in constituting and carrying out such an inquiry.

PETROLEUM CORPORATION MONITORING BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Barrow moved the third reading of Bill S-4, to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of designated petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

JAMES BAY AND NORTHERN QUEBEC NATIVE CLAIMS SETTLEMENT BILL

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT— DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-9, intituled: "An Act to approve, give effect to and declare valid certain agreements between the Grand Council of the Crees (of Quebec), the Northern Quebec Inuit Association, the Government of Quebec, la Société de la Baie James, la Société de développement de la Baie James, la Commission hydro-électrique de Québec and the Government of Canada and certain other related agreements to which the Government of Canada is a party".—(Honourable Senator Goldenberg).

Senator Bourget moved the third reading of Bill C-9, the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement bill.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I was hoping that the sponsor of the bill would offer a few words of explanation relating to the special wording of the report of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. It would have helped me had he done so. But, since he did not, I suppose I should draw the Senate's attention to the report.

The bill was reported without amendment. There are, however, three paragraphs in the report that I should like to read:

Your committee was very much impressed with the evidence presented to it by spokesmen for native groups who were not parties to the James Bay Agreement and is seriously concerned that subclause 3(3) of Bill C-9 provides, in respect of the Territory referred to in the James Bay Agreement, for the extinguishment of all native claims, rights, title and interests of all Indians and all Inuit whether or not they were parties to, or represented by parties to, the Agreement.

● (2110)

Your committee is also seriously concerned that the bill does not specifically provide for a right to compensation in favour of any person who was not a signatory to the Agreement and who has a valid claim relating to the Territory.

Your committee has nevertheless decided to rely on the good faith of the Government of Quebec to negotiate with such third parties, under the terms of section 2.14 of the Agreement, in order to ensure that, in any case where a valid claim is established, compensation will be accorded on the same basis as it would have been accorded had such parties been entitled to participate in the compensation and benefits of the Agreement.

As you can see from this report, even though the bill was not amended, there were serious doubts expressed in committee, and I think it would have been very interesting for members of the Senate to be able to look at the minutes of the committee meetings and see how worried certain senators were. And they must still be worried about the problem that the report alludes to.

As you know, the James Bay Agreement is an agreement involving the James Bay Energy Corporation, the James Bay Development Corporation, the Quebec Hydro Electric Commission, the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec, on one side. On the other side one finds the Grand Council of the Crees of Quebec and the Northern Quebec Inuit Association. By this agreement there is a transfer of the territory described in the agreement to the Government of Quebec and the agencies I have just mentioned as against some compensation to the associations of Indians and Inuit represented in the agreement. The question is whether by this agreement and by the legislation that Parliament is called upon to pass, we are extinguishing completely and without compensation the rights of persons or groups of persons that were not parties to the agreement or represented in the agreement to which the bill refers.

The first question before the committee was: Can third parties have some title or valid claim to the territory? This question was answered in the affirmative in committee. It is a question of fact. But it is not easy to define what a native claim or title is, nor to define interests in a territory. But it seems that the committee came to the conclusion that these could exist. There is no doubt that the agreement itself suggested that there might be titles belonging to persons or groups of persons that were not parties to the agreement because in clause 2.14, which I quoted before, it says:

Québec undertakes to negotiate with other Indians or Inuit who are not entitled to participate in the compensation and benefits of the present Agreement, in respect to any claims which such Indians or Inuit may have with respect to the Territory.

Therefore, I think this question of whether third parties have interests, rights or claims to the territories, has to be answered in the affirmative; at least the possibility exists. There is no doubt about that.

Then, the second question is whether by this legislation we are extinguishing all the rights of these third parties, even their right to compensation. I suggest that the evidence to date indicates that is exactly what Parliament is called upon to do. I refer you to subclause 3(3), which says:

All native claims, rights, title and interests, whatever they may be, in and to the Territory, of all Indians and all Inuit, wherever they may be, are hereby extinguished—

There is another part of the clause which I will not quote because I suggest it has no relevancy to the question, and it would only confuse the argument that I wish to make. "Are hereby extinguished." There is no reference to compensation. But the right to compensation could be among the rights that are mentioned in this text. "All native claims, rights, title and interests"—it is quite clear that the interpretation could be made under this text that the right to compensation of persons who are not party to the agreement are extinguished. And evidence has been adduced in committee that there are some Indians and some Inuit who were not parties to the agreement. They came before us and they went to Quebec on several occasions to claim that they have claims, rights, interests and title to parts of the territory. Therefore, the second question of whether we may be extinguishing the right to compensation by giving a valid and complete title of territory to the Government of Quebec and its agencies has to be answered in the affirmative; that is, that this right to compensation because of this expropriation—the normal rights of compensation—would be extinguished.

The argument was made in committee that since the agreement and the bill are silent, the right to compensation does not disappear, that the formula that one must rely upon is common sense and the normal right of compensation for people who are expropriated. We tested that formula. The committee decided to submit to the Government of Quebec a text in which we said that notwithstanding the extinguishment of all the rights—in other words, notwithstanding the transfer of a valid title—to the Province of Quebec and its agencies, the right to compensation of Indians and Inuit who were not a party to, or were not represented by a party to, the agreement would continue to exist, and they would continue to be entitled to compensation.

● (2120)

We asked, in effect, whether they agreed that this was the interpretation we should give to subclause 3(3). The reply came from the Minister of Natural Resources, Mr. Bérubé, that, no, he could not agree to any amendment which would have the effect of changing the agreement. Therefore, he was admitting that his own interpretation was that there was no right to compensation. Because, had he replied, "We are prepared and we give our undertaking that this is the interpretation we will put on this text," then, obviously, we would have been in a position to say, "Well, if this is the official interpretation of this section, then we can have faith that the government will act according to the interpretation the minister is giving us now."

But, no, he said, "No; this amendment would have the effect of changing the agreement." And this amendment was not creating any right or title except to the extent that if you had a right, title or claim which was valid, then you would be entitled to compensation.

By saying no, the minister admitted that to his mind we were creating something new by adding this amendment, this subclause 3(3). It is therefore quite clear that in the mind of the Government of Quebec, if persons or groups of persons not party to the agreement have rights to the territory, the effect of the bill's becoming law would be to deprive them of those rights, and not only of their rights to the territory but also of their rights to fair compensation in lieu of the territory. There would be no adequate compensation, even supposing they were able to establish such rights and such title.

As a consequence of this reply from the Minister of Natural Resources of the Government of Quebec, I am convinced that the federal Parliament, in being invited to pass this bill without an amendment of the nature proposed to the minister by the committee, is being enticed into making an act of spoliation of the possible, if not clear, rights of persons or groups of persons in the said territory.

After we had heard the minister's reply in committee suggesting we quash the amendment, the argument we heard proposed was that, in the first place, the right to compensation was not being excluded. But, as I have said, it is being excluded, and the minister himself has said so, because he has said it would be a change in the agreement. He said, "You are going farther than we want to go." That was his own interpretation. Do not forget that they will be the ones to enforce the act, and we know precisely what attitude they will adopt.

Another argument we were given was, "We have to rely on the good faith of the Government of Quebec." Well, how can we rely on the good faith of the Government of Quebec, when the minister himself has admitted that in his mind such an amendment would go completely contrary to the agreement. In my mind there is a large question mark there. I can do nothing more than state what I said before, namely, that it is obvious that in the mind of the Government of Quebec the claims of other persons or groups of persons, non-signatories, will not be recognized in any way. That is the position the Government of Quebec intends to take, and it intends to use this pretext as a means of extinguishing their rights. The minister has told us that if we adopt this amendment we might well hurt the two groups who have signed the agreement with the Government of Quebec, the Inuit and the Cree Indians.

Well, if we adopt this amendment and the Government of Quebec uses that fact to renege on its word in the agreement, then I can only say that it will have demonstrated its bad faith. We cannot speak on the one hand of good faith while on the other hand worrying that the Government of Quebec may act in bad faith if we act according to our consciences. I suggest to honourable senators that this is an important question of justice. I have never heard of any expropriation without compensation, but that is precisely what we are being invited to sanction by passing the bill in its present form.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I intend to move an amendment along the lines of the amendment we discussed in committee. Again, I repeat that this amendment will not create rights but will simply say, if certain valid rights are established, then those who have those rights should be compensated for them on the same basis as those whose rights are covered by the agreement. That is quite obvious. Indeed, if I may refer again to the report of the committee, it states:

Your committee has nevertheless decided to rely on the good faith of the Government of Quebec to negotiate with such third parties, under the terms of section 2.14 of the Agreement, in order to ensure that, in any case where a valid claim is established, compensation will be accorded on the same basis as it would have been accorded had such parties been entitled to participate in the compensation and benefits of the Agreement.

Before I move the amendment I have referred to, honourable senators, may I just say a word about section 2.14 by which the Government of Quebec plans to undertake its negotiations. It is quite clear that this is only an undertaking to negotiate, and not an undertaking to compensate. Once the bill is passed in its present form, if the rights are extinguished, the obligation to negotiate with people who have no rights at all will mean absolutely nothing.

Senator Grosart: It would be meaningless.

Senator Flynn: I move, therefore, seconded by Senator Grosart, that Bill C-9 be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by adding immediately after subclause 3(3) on page 3 the following:

(3.1) Notwithstanding the extinguishment under subsection (3) of the native claims, rights, title and interests referred to therein, nothing in that subsection affects the right of any person or group of persons in Canada who was not a party to, or who was not represented by a party to, the Agreement to receive, in respect of any valid claim relating to the Territory, compensation on the same basis as it would have been accorded had such person or group of persons been entitled to participate in the compensation and benefits of the Agreement.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, perhaps in view of the fact that I am the member of the committee who moved the report in its present form—

Senator Grosart: The motion has not been put.

Senator Laird: I am sorry. I did not give Her Honour the Speaker an opportunity to read the amendment. I apologize.

Senator Grosart: Let the motion be put.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart, that Bill C-9 be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by adding immediately after subclause 3(3) on page 3 the following:

(3.1) Notwithstanding the extinguishment under subsection (3) of the native claims, rights, title and interests referred to therein, nothing in that subsection affects the right of any person or group of persons in Canada who was not a party to, or who was not represented by a party to, the Agreement to receive, in respects of any valid claim relating to the Territory, compensation on the same basis as it would have been accorded had such person or group of persons been entitled to participate in the compensation and benefits of the Agreement.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

● (2130)

Hon. Keith Laird: Honourable senators, as the member of the Committee who proposed the report in its present form, perhaps I should at least say why I opposed in committee the type of amendment now proposed here by Senator Flynn. Allow me to say at the outset that I do not consider this to be a frivolous proposal by Senator Flynn at all. I believe that every person in committee was deeply concerned about the rights of so-called third parties. What happened was that negotiations with all the parties mentioned by Senator Flynn were carried on over a long period of time—my recollection of the evidence is that it was five years. Then it was signed. The agreement included those Crees and Inuit who live in the territory affected. Apparently, beyond that, there were very small groups who were offered a right to bargain but did not exercise that right. However, one of the witnesses alleged that there were outsiders who do not live in that territory but who, nevertheless, have hunting and fishing rights there. In the agreement itself, which is approved by this bill and must be sent back to the National Assembly in Quebec City, there is a clause which, as Senator Flynn has pointed out, only goes so far as to compel the Government of Quebec to negotiate with third parties. It does not lay down any provision to the effect that a settlement must be paid. I admit that there is that weakness, and I went along with the move to see if we could reach agreement to make it 100 per cent sure because, as a lawyer, I am not 100 per cent sure of the interpretation based upon extinguishment of rights by Senator Flynn. I wish I were sure one way or the other, but I admit that it is a matter of some doubt.

The only reason I moved that the bill be reported without amendment, but subject to a strong recommendation regarding third parties, was that I felt if we amended the legislation it would have to be returned to the House of Commons, and I was just afraid that it would end up being lost in the shuffle or dying on the order paper, and there is a deadline of November 1, 1977, involved. That is the one reason that with reluctance I had to oppose Senator Flynn's proposal and subsequent amendment. It is for those very reasons that I am afraid I must oppose the amendment now, I am afraid that if the bill does become lost in the shuffle in the other place, or dies on the order paper, the Inuit and the Crees who live in this area will not be compensated.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Asselin: Why?
